MESSAGE

OF

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

An appalling calamity has befallen the American people since their chosen representatives last met in the halls where you are now assembled. We might else recall with unalloyed content the rare prosperity with which throughout the year the nation has been blessed. Its harvests have been plenteous; its varied industries have thriven; the health of its people has been preserved; it has maintained with foreign governments the undisturbed relations of amity and peace. For these manifestations of His favor, we owe to Him who holds our destiny in His hands the tribute of our grateful devotion.

To that mysterious exercise of His will, which has taken from us the loved and illustrious citizen who was but lately the head of the nation, we bow in sorrow and submission.

The memory of his exalted character, of his noble achievements, and of his patriotic life will be treasured forever as a sacred possession of the whole people.

The announcement of his death drew from foreign governments and peoples tributes of sympathy and sorrow which history will record as signal tokens of the kinship of nations and the federation of mankind.

The feeling of good-will between our own government and that of Great Britain was never more marked than at present. In recognition of this pleasing fact, I directed, on the occasion of the late centennial celebration at Yorktown, that a salute be given to the British flag.

Save for the correspondence to which I shall refer hereafter in relation to the proposed canal across the Isthmus of Panama, little has occurred worthy of mention in the diplomatic relations of the two countries.

Early in the year the Fortune Bay claims were satisfactorily settled by the British Government paying in full the sum of £15,000, most of which has been already distributed. As the terms of the settlement included compensation for injuries suffered by our fishermen at Aspee Bay, there has been retained from the gross award a sum which is deemed adequate for those claims.

The participation of Americans in the exhibitions at Melbourne and Sydney will be approvingly mentioned in the reports of the two exhibitions, soon to be presented to Congress. They will disclose the readiness of our countrymen to make successful competition in distant fields of enterprise.

Negotiations for an International Copyright Convention are in hopeful progress.

The surrender of Sitting Bull and his forces upon the Canadian frontier has allayed apprehension, although bodies of British Indians still cross the border in quest of sustenance. Upon this subject a correspondence has been opened, which promises an adequate understanding. Our troops have orders to avoid meanwhile all collisions with alien Indians.

The presence at the Yorktown celebration of representatives of the French Republic and descendants of Lafayette and of his gallant compatriots who were our allies in the Revolution, has served to strengthen the spirit of good-will which has always existed between the two nations.

You will be furnished with the proceedings of the Bi-metallic Conference held during the summer at the city of Paris. No accord was reached, but a valuable interchange of views was had, and the conference will next year be renewed.

At the Electrical Exhibition and Congress also held at Paris, this country was creditably represented by eminent specialists who, in the absence of an appropriation, generously lent their efficient aid at the instance of the State Department. While our exhibitors in this almost distinctively American field of achievement have won several valuable awards, I recommend that Congress provide for the repayment of the personal expenses incurred, in the public interest, by the honorary commissioners and delegates.

No new questions respecting the status of our naturalized citizens in Germany have arisen during the year, and the causes of complaint, especially in Alsace and Lorraine, have practically ceased through the liberal action of the Imperial Government in accepting our often-expressed views on the subject. The application of the treaty of 1868 to the lately acquired Rhenish provinces has received very earnest attention, and a definite and lasting agreement on this point is confidently expected. The participation of the descendants of Baron von Steuben in the Yorktown festivities, and their subsequent reception by their American kinsmen, strikingly evinced the ties of good-will which unite the German people and our own.

Our intercourse with Spain has been friendly. An agreement concluded in February last fixes a term for the labors of the Spanish and American Claims Commission. The Spanish Government has been requested to pay the late awards of that commission, and will, it is believed, accede to the request as promptly and courteously as on former occasions.

By recent legislation onerous fines have been imposed upon American shipping in Spanish and colonial ports for slight irregularities in manifests. One case of hardship is specially worthy of attention. The bark "Masonic," bound for Japan, entered Manila in distress, and is there sought to be confiscated under Spanish revenue laws for an alleged shortage in her trans-shipped cargo. Though efforts for her relief have thus far proved unavailing, it is expected that the whole matter will be adjusted in a friendly spirit.

The Senate resolutions of condolence on the assassination of the Czar Alexander II were appropriately communicated to the Russian Government, which in turn has expressed its sympathy in our late national bereavement. It is desirable that our cordial relations with Russia should be strengthened by proper engagements, assuring to peaceable Americans who visit the Empire the consideration which is due to them as citizens of a friendly state. This is especially needful with respect to American Israelites, whose classification with the native Hebrews has evoked energetic remonstrances from this government.

A supplementary consular agreement with Italy has been sanctioned and proclaimed, which puts at rest conflicts of jurisdiction in the case of crimes on shipboard.

Several important international conferences have been held in Italy during the year. At the Geographical Congress of Venice, the Beneficence Congress of Milan, and the Hygienic Congress of Turin, this country was represented by delegates from branches of the public service, or by private citizens duly accredited in an honorary capacity. It is hoped that Congress will give such prominence to the results of their participation as they may seem to deserve.

The abolition of all discriminating duties against such colonial productions of the Dutch East Indies as are imported hither from Holland has been already considered by Congress. I trust that at the present session the matter may be favorably concluded.

The insecurity of life and property in many parts of Turkey has given rise to correspondence with the Porte, looking particularly to the better protection of American missionaries in the empire. The condemned murderer of the eminent missionary Dr. Justin W. Parsons has not yet been executed, although this government has repeatedly demanded that exemplary justice be done.

The Swiss Government has again solicited the good offices of our diplomatic and consular agents for the protection of its citizens in countries where it is not itself represented. This request has, within proper limits, been granted.

Our agents in Switzerland have been instructed to protest against the conduct of the authorities of certain communes in permitting the emigration to this country of criminals and other objectionable persons. Several such persons, through the cooperation of the Commissioners of Emigration at New York, have been sent back by the steamers which brought them. A continuance of this course may prove a more effectual remedy than diplomatic remonstrance.

Treaties of commerce and navigation, and for the regulation of consular privileges, have been concluded with Roumania and Servia since their admission into the family of European states.

As is natural with contiguous States having like institutions and like aims of advancement and development, the friendship of the United States and Mexico has been constantly maintained. This government has lost no occasion of encouraging the Mexican Government to a beneficial realization of the mutual advantages which will result from more intimate commercial intercourse, and from the opening of the rich interior of Mexico to railway enterprise. I deem it important that means be provided to restrain the lawlessness unfortunately so common on the frontier, and to suppress the forays of the reservation Indians on either side of the Rio Grande.

The neighboring states of Central America have preserved internal peace, and their outward relations toward us have been those of intimate friendship. There are encouraging signs of their growing disposition to subordinate their local interests to those which are common to them by reason of their geographical relations.

The boundary dispute between Guatemala and Mexico has afforded this government an opportunity to exercise its good offices for preventing a rupture between those states, and for procuring a peaceable solution of the question. I cherish strong hope that in view of our relations of amity with both countries our friendly counsels may prevail.

A special envoy of Guatemala has brought to me the condolences of his government and people on the death of President Garfield.

The Costa Rican Government lately framed an engagement with Colombia for settling by arbitration the boundary question between those countries, providing that the post of arbitrator should be offered successively to the King of the Belgians, the King of Spain, and the President of the Argentine Confederation. The King of the Belgians has declined to act, but I am not as yet advised of the action of the King of Spain. As we have certain interests in the disputed territory which are protected by our treaty engagements with one of the parties, it is important that the arbitration should not, without our consent, affect our rights, and this government has accordingly thought proper to make its views known to the parties to the agreement, as well as to intimate them to the Belgian and Spanish Governments.

The questions growing out of the proposed interoceanic water-way across the Isthmus of Panama are of grave national importance. This government has not been unmindful of the solemn obligations imposed upon it by its compact of 1846 with Colombia, as the independent and sovereign mistress of the territory crossed by the canal, and has sought to render them effective by fresh engagements with the Colombian Republic looking to their practical execution. The negotiations to this end, after they had reached what appeared to be a mutually satisfactory solution here, were met in Colombia by a disavowal of the powers which its envoy had assumed, and by a proposal for renewed negotiation on a modified basis.

Meanwhile this government learned that Colombia had proposed to the European powers to join in a guarantee of the neutrality of the proposed Panama Canal—a guarantee which would be in direct contravention of our obligation as the sole guarantor of the integrity of Colombian territory and of the neutrality of the canal itself. My lamented predecessor felt it his duty to place before the European powers the reasons which make the prior guarantee of the United States indispensable, and for which the interjection of any foreign guarantee might be regarded as a superfluous and unfriendly act.

Foreseeing the probable reliance of the British Government on the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, as affording room for a share in the guarantees which the United States covenanted with Colombia four years before, I have not hesitated to supplement the action of my predecessor by proposing to Her Majesty's Government the modification of that instrument and the abrogation of such clauses thereof as do not comport with the obligations of the United States toward Colombia, or with the vital needs of the two friendly parties to the compact.

This government sees with great concern the continuance of the hostile relations between Chili, Bolivia, and Peru. An early peace between these republics is much to be desired, not only that they may themselves be spared further misery and bloodshed, but because their continued antagonism threatens consequences which are, in my judgment, dangerous to the interests of republican government on this continent, and calculated to destroy the best elements of our free and peaceful civilization.

As in the present excited condition of popular feeling in these countries there has been serious misapprehension of the position of the United States, and as separate diplomatic intercourse with each through independent ministers is sometimes subject, owing to the want of prompt reciprocal communication, to temporary misunderstanding, I have deemed it judicious, at the present time, to send a special envoy, accredited to all and each of them, and furnished with general instructions, which will, I trust, enable him to bring these powers into friendly relations.

The government of Venezuela maintains its attitude of warm friendship, and continues with great regularity its payment of the monthly quota of the diplomatic debt. Without suggesting the direction in which Congress should act, I ask its attention to the pending questions affecting the distribution of the sums thus far received.

The relations between Venezuela and France, growing out of the same debt, have been for some time past in an unsatisfactory state, and this government, as the neighbor and one of the largest creditors of Venezuela, has interposed its influence with the French Government with the view of producing a friendly and honorable adjustment.

I regret that the commercial interests between the United States and Brazil, from which great advantages were hoped a year ago, have suffered from the withdrawal of the American lines of communication between the Brazilian ports and our own.

Through the efforts of our minister resident at Buenos Ayres and the United States minister at Santiago, a treaty has been concluded between the Argentine Republic and Chili, disposing of the long-pending Patagonian boundary question. It is a matter of congratulation that our government has been afforded the opportunity of successfully exerting its good influence for the prevention of disagreements between these republics of the American continent.

I am glad to inform you that the treaties lately negotiated with China have been duly ratified on both sides, and the exchange made at Peking. Legislation is necessary to carry their provisions into effect. The prompt and friendly spirit with which the Chinese Government, at the request of the United States, conceded the modification of existing treaties, should secure careful regard for the interests and susceptibilities of that government in the enactment of any laws relating to Chinese immigration.

Those clauses of the treaties which forbid the participation of citizens or vessels of the United States in the opium trade will doubtless receive your approval. They will attest the sincere interest which our people and government feel in the commendable efforts of the Chinese Government to put a stop to this demoralizing and destructive traffic.

In relation both to China and Japan, some changes are desirable in our present system of consular jurisdiction. I hope at some future time to lay before you a scheme for its improvement in the entire East.

The intimacy between our own country and Japan, the most advanced of the eastern nations, continues to be cordial. I am advised that the Emperor contemplates the establishment of full constitutional government and that he has already summoned a parliamentary congress for the purpose of effecting the change. Such a remarkable step toward complete assimilation with the western system cannot fail to bring Japan into closer and more beneficial relationship with ourselves as the chief Pacific power.

A question has arisen in relation to the exercise in that country of the judicial functions conferred upon our ministers and consuls. The indictment, trial, and conviction in the consular court at Yokohama of John Ross, a merchant-seaman on board an American vessel, have made it necessary for the government to institute a careful examination into the nature and methods of this jurisdiction.

It appeared that Ross was regularly shipped under the flag of the United States, but was by birth a British subject. My predecessor felt it his duty to maintain the position that, during his service as a regularly shipped seaman on board an American merchant vessel, Ross was subject to the laws of that service and to the jurisdiction of the United States consular authorities.

I renew the recommendation which has been heretofore urged by the Executive upon the attention of Congress, that after the reduction of such amount as may be found due to American citizens, the balance of the indemnity funds heretofore obtained from China and Japan, and which are now in the hands of the State Department, be returned to the governments of those countries.

The King of Hawaii, in the course of his homeward return after a journey around the world, has lately visited this country. While our relations with that kingdom are friendly, this government has viewed with concern the efforts to seek replenishment of the diminishing population of the islands from outward sources, to a degree which may impair the native sovereignty and independence, in which the United States was among the first to testify a lively interest.

Relations of unimpaired amity have been maintained throughout the year with the respective Governments of Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, Hayti, Paraguay and Uruguay, Portugal, and Sweden and Norway. This may also be said of Greece and Ecuador, although our relations with those states have for some years been severed by the withdrawal of appropriations for diplomatic representatives at Athens and Quito. It seems expedient to restore those missions, even on a reduced scale, and I decidedly recommend such a course with respect to Ecuador, which is likely, within the near future, to play an important part among the nations of the Southern Pacific.

At its last extra session the Senate called for the text of the Geneva Convention for the relief of the wounded in war. I trust that this action foreshadows such interest in the subject as will result in the adhesion of the United States to that humane and commendable engagement.

I invite your attention to the propriety of adopting the new Code of International Rules for the Prevention of Collisions on the high seas, and of conforming the domestic legislation of the United States thereto, so that no confusion may arise from the application of conflicting rules in the case of vessels of different nationalities meeting in tidal waters. These international rules differ but slightly from our own They have been adopted by the Navy Department for the governance of the war ships of the United States on the high seas and in foreign waters; and, through the action of the State Department in disseminating the rules, and in acquainting shipmasters with the option of conforming to them without the jurisdictional waters of the United States, they are now very generally known and obeyed.

The State Department still continues to publish to the country the trade and manufacturing reports received from its officers abroad. The success of this course warrants its continuance, and such appro priation as may be required to meet the rapidly-increasing demand for these publications. With special reference to the Atlanta Cotton Exposition, the October number of the reports was devoted to a valuable collection of papers on the cotton-goods trade of the world.

The International Sanitary Conference, for which, in 1879, Congress made provision, assembled in this city early in January last, and its sessions were prolonged until March. Although it reached no specific conclusions affecting the future action of the participant powers, the interchange of views proved to be most valuable. The full protocols of the sessions have been already presented to the Senate.

As pertinent to this general subject I call your attention to the operations of the National Board of Health. Established by act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, its sphere of duty was enlarged by the act of June 2 in the same year. By the last-named act the board was required to institute such measures as might be deemed necessary for preventing the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases from foreign countries into the United States or from one State into another.

The execution of the rules and regulations prepared by the board and approved by my predecessor has done much to arrest the progress of epidemic disease, and has thus rendered substantial service to the nation.

The International Sanitary Conference, to which I have referred, adopted a form of a bill of health to be used by all vessels seeking to enter the ports of the countries whose representatives participated in its deliberatons. This form has since been prescribed by the National Board of Health and incorporated with its rules and regulations, which have been approved by me in pursuance of law.

The health of the people is of supreme importance. All measures looking to their protection against the spread of contagious diseases, and to the increase of our sanitary knowledge for such purposes, deserve attention of Congress.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents in detail a highly satisfactory exhibit of the state of the finances and the condition of the various branches of the public service administered by that department.

The ordinary revenues from all sources for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, were:

From customs	$198,159,676 02
From internal revenue	135,264,385 51
From sales of public lands	2,201,863 17
From tax on circulation and deposits of national banks	8,116,115 72
From repayment of interest by Pacific Railway Companies	810,833 80
From sinking fund for Pacific Railway Companies	805,180 54
From customs fees, fines, penalties, &c	1,225,514 86
From fees—consular, letters patent, and lands	2,244,983 98

From proceeds of sales of government property	$262,174 00
From profits on coinage	3,468,485 61
From revenues of the District of Columbia	2,016,199 23
From miscellaneous sources	6,206,880 13
Total ordinary receipts	360,782,292 57

The ordinary expenditures for the same period were:

For civil expenses	$17,941,177 19
For foreign intercourse	1,093,954 92
For Indians	6,514,161 09
For pensions	50,059,279 62
For the military establishment, including river and harbor improvements and arsenals	40,466,460 55
For the naval establishment, including vessels, machinery, and improvements at navy-yards	15,686,671 66
For miscellaneous expenditures, including public buildings, light-houses, and collecting the revenue	41,837,280 57
For expenditures on account of the District of Columbia	3,543,912 03
For interest on the public debt	82,508,741 18
For premium on bonds purchased	1,061,248 78
Total ordinary expenditures	260,712,887 59
Leaving a surplus revenue of	100,069,404 98

Which was applied as follows:

To the redemption of—

Bonds for the sinking fund	$74,371,200 00
Fractional currency for the sinking fund	109,001 05
Loan of February, 1861	7,418,000 00
Ten-forties of 1864	2,016,150 00
Five-twenties of 1862	18,300 00
Five-twenties of 1864	3,400 00
Five-twenties of 1865	37,300 00
Consols of 1865	143,150 00
Consols of 1867	959,150 00
Consols of 1868	337,400 00
Texan indemnity stock	1,000 00
Old demand, compound-interest, and other notes	18,330 00
And to the increase of cash in the Treasury	14,637,023 93

The requirements of the sinking fund for the year amounted to $90,786,064.02, which sum included a balance of $49,817,128.78, not provided for during the previous fiscal year. The sum of $74,480,201.05 was applied to this fund, which left a deficit of $16,305,873.47. The increase of the revenues for 1881 over those of the previous year was $29,352,901.10. It is estimated that the receipts during the present fiscal year will reach $400,000,000, and the expenditures $270,000,000, leaving a surplus of $130,000,000 applicable to the sinking fund and the redemption of the public debt.

I approve the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, that provision be made for the early retirement of silver certificates, and that the act requiring their issue be repealed. They were issued in pursuance of the policy of the government to maintain silver at or near the gold standard, and were accordingly made receivable for all customs, taxes, and public dues. About sixty-six millions of them are now outstanding. They form an unnecessary addition to the paper currency, a sufficient amount of which may be readily supplied by the national banks.

In accordance with the act of February 28, 1878, the Treasury Department has, monthly, caused at least two millions in value of silver bullion to be coined into standard silver dollars. One hundred and two millions of these dollars have been already coined, while only about thirty-four millions are in circulation.

For the reasons which he specifies, I concur in the Secretary's recommendation that the provision for coinage of a fixed amount each month be repealed, and that hereafter only so much be coined as shall be necessary to supply the demand.

The Secretary advises that the issue of gold certificates should not for the present be resumed, and suggests that the national banks may properly be forbidden by law to retire their currency except upon reasonable notice of their intention so to do. Such legislation would seem to be justified by the recent action of certain banks on the occasion referred to in the Secretary's report.

Of the fifteen millions of fractional currency still outstanding, only about eighty thousand has been redeemed the past year. The suggestion that this amount may properly be dropped from future statements of the public debt seems worthy of approval.

So, also, does the suggestion of the Secretary as to the advisability of relieving the calendar of the United States courts in the southern district of New York, by the transfer to another tribunal of the numerous suits there pending against collectors.

The revenue from customs for the past fiscal year was $198,159,676.02, an increase of $11,637,611.42 over that of the year preceding. $138,098,562.39 of this amount was collected at the port of New York, leaving $50,251,113.63 as the amount collected at all the other ports of the country. Of this sum, $47,977,137.63 was collected on sugar, melado, and molasses; $27,285,624.78 on wool and its manufactures; $21,462,534.34 on iron and steel, and manufactures thereof; $19,038,665.81 on manufactures of silk;

$10,825,115.21 on manufactures of cotton; and $6,469,643.04 on wines and spirits; making a total revenue from these sources, of $133,058,720.81.

The expenses of collection for the past year were $6,419,345.20, an increase over the preceding year of $387,410.04. Notwithstanding the increase in the revenue from customs over the preceding year, the gross value of the imports, including free goods, decreased over twenty-five millions of dollars. The most marked decrease was in the value of unmanufactured wool, $14,023,682, and in that of scrap and pig iron, $12,810,671. The value of imported sugar, on the other hand showed an increase of $7,457,474; of steel rails, $4,345,521; of barley, $2,154,204; and of steel in bars, ingots, &c., $1,620,046.

Contrasted with the imports during the last fiscal year, the exports were as follows:

Domestic merchandise	$883,925,947
Foreign merchandise	18,451,399
Total	902,377,346
Imports of merchandise	642,664,628
Excess of exports over imports of merchandise	259,712,718
Aggregate of exports and imports	1,545,041,974

Compared with the previous year, there was an increase of $66,738,688 in the value of exports of merchandise, and a decrease of $25,290,118 in the value of imports. The annual average of the excess of imports of merchandise over exports thereof, for ten years previous to June 30, 1873, was $104,706,922; but for the last six years there has been an excess of exports over imports of merchandise amounting to $1,180,668,105, an annual average of $196,778,017. The specie value of the exports of domestic merchandise was $376,616,473 in 1870, and $883,925,947 in 1881, an increase of $507,309,474, or 135 per cent. The value of imports was $435,958,408 in 1870, and $642,664,628 in 1881, an increase of $206,706,220, or 47 per cent.

During each year from 1862 to 1879, inclusive, the exports of specie exceeded the imports. The largest excess of such exports over imports was reached during the year 1864, when it amounted to $92,280,929. But during the year ended June 30, 1880, the imports of coin and bullion exceeded the exports by $75,891,391; and during the last fiscal year the excess of imports over exports was $91,168,650.

In the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury the attention of Congress was called to the fact that $469,651,050 in five per centum bonds and $203,573,750 in six per centum bonds would become redeemable during the year, and Congress was asked to authorize the refunding of these bonds at a lower rate of interest. The bill for such refunding having failed to become a law, the Secretary of the Treasury, in April last, notified the holders of the $195,690,400 six per centum bonds then outstanding, that the bonds would be paid at par on the first day of July following, or that they might be "continued" at the pleasure of the government, to bear interest at the rate of three and one-half per centum per annum.

Under this notice $178,055,150 of the six per centum bonds were continued at the lower rate, and $17,635,250 were redeemed.

In the month of May a like notice was given respecting the redemption or continuance of the $439,841,350 of five per centum bonds then outstanding, and of these, $401,504,900 were continued at three and one-half per centum per annum, and $38,336,450 redeemed.

The six per centum bonds of the loan of February 8, 1861, and of the Oregon war debt, amounting together to $14,125,800, having matured during the year, the Secretary of the Treasury gave notice of his intention to redeem the same, and such as have been presented have been paid from the surplus revenues. There have also been redeemed at par $16,179,100 of the three and one-half per centum "continued" bonds, making a total of bonds redeemed, or which have ceased to bear interest during the year, of $123,969,650.

The reduction of the annual interest on the public debt through these transactions is as follows:

By reduction of interest to three and one-half per cent..	$10,473,952 25
By redemption of bonds	6,352,340 00
Total	16,826,292 25

The three and one-half per centum bonds, being payable at the pleasure of the government, are available for the investment of surplus revenue without the payment of premiums.

Unless these bonds can be funded at a much lower rate of interest than they now bear, I agree with the Secretary of the Treasury that no legislation respecting them is desirable.

It is a matter for congratulation that the business of the country has been so prosperous during the past year as to yield by taxation a large surplus of income to the government. If the revenue laws remain unchanged this surplus must, year by year, increase, on account of the reduction of the public debt and its burden of interest, and because of the rapid increase of our population. In 1860, just prior to the institution of our internal-revenue system, our population but slightly exceeded 30,000,000; by the census of 1880 it is now found to exceed 50,000,000. It is estimated that even if the annual receipts and expenditures should continue as at present the entire debt could be paid in ten years.

In view, however, of the heavy load of taxation which our people have already borne, we may well consider whether it is not the part of wisdom to reduce the revenues, even if we delay a little the payment of the debt.

It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden, and that by due economy in the various branches of the public service, this may readily be afforded.

I therefore concur with the Secretary in recommending the abolition of all internal-revenue taxes, except those upon tobacco in its various forms, and upon distilled spirits and fermented liquors; and except also the special tax upon the manufacturers of, and dealers in, such articles. The retention of the latter tax is desirable as affording the officers of the government a proper supervision of these articles for the prevention of fraud. I agree with the Secretary of the Treasury, that the law imposing a stamp tax upon matches, proprietary articles, playing cards, checks, and drafts, may with propriety be repealed, and the law also by which banks and bankers are assessed upon their capital and deposits. There seems to be a general sentiment in favor of this course.

In the present condition of our revenues the tax upon deposits is especially unjust. It was never imposed in this country until it was demanded by the necessities of war, and was never exacted, I believe, in any other country, even in its greatest exigencies. Banks are required to secure their circulation by pledging with the Treasurer of the United States bonds of the general government. The interest upon these bonds, which at the time when the tax was imposed was 6 per cent., is now, in most instances, 3½ per cent. Besides, the entire circulation was originally limited by law and no increase was allowable. When the existing banks had practically a monopoly of the business, there was force in the suggestion, that for the franchise to the favored grantees the government might very properly exact a tax on circulation; but for years the system has been free, and the amount of circulation regulated by the public demand.

The retention of this tax has been suggested as a means of reimbursing the government for the expense of printing and furnishing the circulating notes. If the tax should be repealed it would certainly seem proper to require the national banks to pay the amount of such expense to the Comptroller of the Currency.

It is perhaps doubtful whether the immediate reduction of the rate of taxation upon liquors and tobacco is advisable, especially in view of the drain upon the Treasury which must attend the payment of arrears of pensions. A comparison, however, of the amount of taxes collected under the varying rates of taxation which have at different times prevailed, suggests the intimation that some reduction may soon be made without material diminution of the revenue.

The tariff laws also need revision; but, that a due regard may be paid to the conflicting interests of our citizens, important changes should be made with caution. If a careful revision cannot be made at this session, a commission such as was lately approved by the Senate and is now recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury would doubtless lighten the labors of Congress whenever this subject shall be brought to its consideration.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of War will make known to you the operations of that department for the past year.

He suggests measures for promoting the efficiency of the Army without adding to the number of its officers, and recommends the legislation necessary to increase the number of enlisted men to thirty thousand, the maximum allowed by law.

This he deems necessary to maintain quietude on our ever-shifting frontier; to preserve peace and suppress disorder and marauding in new settlements; to protect settlers and their property against Indians, and Indians against the encroachments of intruders; and to enable peaceable immigrants to establish homes in the most remote parts of our country.

The Army is now necessarily scattered over such a vast extent of territory that, whenever an outbreak occurs, reinforcements must be hurried from many quarters, over great distances, and always at heavy cost for transportation of men, horses, wagons, and supplies.

I concur in the recommendations of the Secretary for increasing the Army to the strength of thirty thousand enlisted men.

It appears by the Secretary's report that in the absence of disturbances on the frontier the troops have been actively employed in collecting the Indians hitherto hostile, and locating them on their proper reservations; that Sitting Bull and his adherents are now prisoners at Fort Randall; that the Utes have been moved to their new reservation in Utah; that during the recent outbreak of the Apaches it was necessary to reinforce the garrisons in Arizona by troops withdrawn from New Mexico; and that some of the Apaches are now held prisoners for trial, while some have escaped, and the majority of the tribe are now on their reservation.

There is need of legislation to prevent intrusion upon the lands set apart for the Indians. A large military force, at great expense, is now required to patrol the boundary line between Kansas and the Indian Territory. The only punishment that can at present be inflicted is the forcible removal of the intruder and the imposition of a pecuniary fine, which, in most cases, it is impossible to collect. There should be a penalty by imprisonment in such cases.

The separate organization of the Signal Service is urged by the Secretary of War, and a full statement of the advantages of such permanent organization is presented in the report of the Chief Signal Officer. A detailed account of the useful work performed by the Signal Corps and the Weather Bureau, is also given in that report.

I ask attention to the statements of the Secretary of War regarding the requisitions frequently made by the Indian Bureau upon the Subsistence Department of the Army for the casual support of bands and tribes of Indians whose appropriations are exhausted. The War Department should not be left, by reason of inadequate provision for the Indian Bureau, to contribute for the maintenance of Indians.

The report of the Chief of Engineers furnishes a detailed account of the operations for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

I commend to your attention the suggestions contained in this report in regard to the condition of our fortifications, especially our coast defenses, and recommend an increase of the strength of the Engineer Battalion, by which the efficiency of our torpedo system would be improved.

I also call your attention to the remarks upon the improvement of the South Pass of the Mississippi River, the proposed free bridge over the Potomac River at Georgetown, the importance of completing at an early day the north wing of the War Department building, and other recommendations of the Secretary of War which appear in his report.

The actual expenditures of that department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, were $42,122,201.39. The appropriations for the year 1882 were $44,889,725.42. The estimates for 1883 are $44,541,276.91.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy exhibits the condition of that branch of the service, and presents valuable suggestions for its improvement. I call your especial attention also to the appended report of the Advisory Board, which he convened to devise suitable measures for increasing the efficiency of the Navy, and particularly to report as to the character and number of vessels necessary to place it upon a footing commensurate with the necessities of the government.

I cannot too strongly urge upon you my conviction that every consideration of national safety, economy, and honor imperatively demands a thorough rehabilitation of our Navy.

With a full appreciation of the fact that compliance with the suggestions of the head of that department and of the Advisory Board must involve a large expenditure of the public moneys, I earnestly recommend such appropriations as will accomplish an end which seems to me so desirable.

Nothing can be more inconsistent with true public economy than withholding the means necessary to accomplish the objects intrusted by the Constitution to the national legislature. One of those objects, and one which is of paramount importance, is declared by our fundamental law to be the provision for the "common defense." Surely nothing is more essential to the defense of the United States and of all our people than the efficiency of our Navy.

We have for many years maintained with foreign governments the relations of honorable peace, and that such relations may be permanent is desired by every patriotic citizen of the Republic.

But if we heed the teachings of history we shall not forget that in the life of every nation emergencies may arise when a resort to arms can alone save it from dishonor.

No danger from abroad now threatens this people, nor have we any cause to distrust the friendly professions of other governments.

But for avoiding as well as for repelling dangers that may threaten us in the future, we must be prepared to enforce any policy which we think wise to adopt.

We must be ready to defend our harbors against aggression, to protect, by the distribution of our ships of war over the highways of commerce, the varied interests of our foreign trade, and the persons and property of our citizens abroad, to maintain everywhere the honor of our flag, and the distinguished position which we may rightfully claim among the nations of the world.

The report of the Postmaster-General is a gratifying exhibit of the growth and efficiency of the postal service.

The receipts from postage and other ordinary sources during the past fiscal year were $36,489,816.58. The receipts from the money-order business were $295,581.39, making a total of $36,785,397.97. The expenditure for the fiscal year was $39,251,736.46. The deficit supplied out of the general Treasury was $2,481,129.35, or $6\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. of the amount expended. The receipts were $3,469,918.63 in excess of those of the previous year, and $4,575,397.97 in excess of the estimate made two years ago, before the present period of business prosperity had fairly begun.

The whole number of letters mailed in this country in the last fiscal year exceeded one thousand millions.

The registry system is reported to be in excellent condition, having been remodeled during the past four years, with good results. The amount of registration fees collected during the last fiscal year was $712,882.20, an increase over the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, of $345,443.40.

The entire number of letters and packages registered during the year was 8,338,919, of which only 2,061 were lost or destroyed in transit.

The operations of the money-order system are multiplying yearly under the impulse of immigration, of the rapid development of the newer States and Territories, and the consequent demand for additional means of intercommunication and exchange.

During the past year, 338 additional money-order offices have been established, making a total of 5,499 in operation at the date of this report.

During the year the domestic money orders aggregated in value $105,075,769.35.

A modification of the system is suggested, reducing the fees for money orders not exceeding $5 from ten cents to five cents, and making the maximum limit $100 in place of $50.

Legislation for the disposition of unclaimed money orders in the possession of the Post-Office Department is recommended, in view of the fact that their total value now exceeds one million dollars.

The attention of Congress is again invited to the subject of establishing a system of savings depositories in connection with the Post-Office Department.

The statistics of mail transportation show that during the past year railroad routes have been increased in length 6,249 miles, and in cost $1,114,382, while steamboat routes have been decreased in length 2,182 miles, and in cost $134,054. The so-called star routes have been decreased in length 3,949 miles, and in cost $364,144.

Nearly all of the more expensive routes have been superseded by railroad service. The cost of the star service must therefore rapidly decrease in the Western States and Territories.

The Postmaster-General, however, calls attention to the constantly increasing cost of the railway mail service as a serious difficulty in the way of making the department self-sustaining.

Our postal intercourse with foreign countries has kept pace with the growth of the domestic service. Within the past year several countries and colonies have declared their adhesion to the Postal Union. It now includes all those which have an organized postal service, except Bolivia, Costa Rica, New Zealand, and the British colonies in Australia.

As has been already stated, great reductions have recently been made in the expense of the star-route service. The investigations of the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department have resulted in the presentation of indictments against persons formerly connected with that service, accusing them of offenses against the United States. I have enjoined upon the officials who are charged with the conduct of the cases on the part of the government and upon the eminent counsel who, before my accession to the Presidency, were called to their assistance, the duty of prosecuting with the utmost vigor of the law all persons who may be found chargeable with frauds upon the postal service.

The Acting Attorney-General calls attention to the necessity of modifying the present system of the courts of the United States—a necessity due to the large increase of business, especially in the Supreme Court. Litigation in our Federal tribunals became greatly expanded after the close of the late war. So long as that expansion might be attributable to the abnormal condition in which the community found itself immediately after the return of peace, prudence required that no change be made in the constitution of our judicial tribunals.

But it has now become apparent that an immense increase of litigation has directly resulted from the wonderful growth and development of the country. There is no ground for belief that the business of the United States courts will ever be less in volume than at present. Indeed, that it is likely to be much greater is generally recognized by the bench and bar.

In view of the fact that Congress has already given much consideration to this subject, I make no suggestion as to detail, but express the hope that your deliberations may result in such legislation as will give early relief to our overburdened courts.

The Acting Attorney-General also calls attention to the disturbance of the public tranquility during the past year in the Territory of Arizona. A band of armed desperadoes, known as "Cow Boys," probably numbering from fifty to one hundred men, have been engaged for months in committing acts of lawlessness and brutality which the local authorities have been unable to repress. The depredations of these "Cow Boys" have also extended into Mexico, which the marauders reach from the Arizona frontier. With every disposition to meet the exigencies of the case, I am embarrassed by lack of authority to deal with them effectually. The punishment of crimes committed within Arizona should ordinarily, of course, be left to the Territorial authorities. But it is worthy consideration whether acts which necessarily tend to embroil the United States with neighboring governments should not be declared crimes against the United States. Some of the incursions alluded to may perhaps be within the scope of the law (Revised Statutes, section 5286) forbidding "military expeditions or enterprises" against friendly states; but in view of the speedy assembling of your body, I have preferred to await such legislation as in your wisdom the occasion may seem to demand.

It may, perhaps, be thought proper to provide that the setting on foot within our own territory, of brigandage and armed marauding expeditions against friendly nations and their citizens, shall be punishable as an offense against the United States.

I will add that in the event of a request from the Territorial government for protection by the United States against "domestic violence," this government would be powerless to render assistance.

The act of 1795, chapter 36, passed at a time when Territorial governments received little attention from Congress, enforced this duty of the United States only as to the State governments. But the act of 1807, chapter 39, applied also to Territories. This law seems to have remained in force until the revision of the statutes, when the provision for the Territories was dropped. I am not advised whether this alteration was intentional or accidental, but, as it seems to me that the Territories should be offered the protection which is accorded to the States by the Constitution, I suggest legislation to that end.

It seems to me, too, that whatever views may prevail as to the policy of recent legislation by which the Army has ceased to be a part of the posse comitatus, an exception might well be made for permitting the military to assist the civil Territorial authorities in enforcing the laws of the United States. This use of the Army would not seem to be within the alleged evil against which that legislation was aimed. From sparseness of population and other circumstances it is often quite impracticable to summon a civil posse in places where officers of justice require assistance, and where a military force is within easy reach.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior, with accompanying documents, presents an elaborate account of the business of that department. A summary of it would be too extended for this place. I ask your careful attention to the report itself.

Prominent among the matters which challenge the attention of Congress at its present session is the management of our Indian affairs. While this question has been a cause of trouble and embarrassment from the infancy of the government, it is but recently that any effort has been made for its solution, at once serious, determined, consistent, and promising success.

It has been easier to resort to convenient makeshifts for tiding over temporary difficulties than to grapple with the great permanent problem, and, accordingly, the easier course has almost invariably been pursued.

It was natural, at a time when the national territory seemed almost illimitable and contained many millions of acres far outside the bounds of civilized settlements, that a policy should have been initiated which more than aught else has been the fruitful source of our Indian complications.

I refer of course to the policy of dealing with the various Indian tribes as separate nationalities, of relegating them by treaty stipulations to the occupancy of immense reservations in the West, and of encouraging them to live a savage life, undisturbed by any earnest and well directed efforts to bring them under the influences of civilization.

The unsatisfactory results which have sprung from this policy are becoming apparent to all.

As the white settlements have crowded the borders of the reservations, the Indians, sometimes contentedly and sometimes against their will, have been transferred to other hunting-grounds, from which they have again been dislodged whenever their new-found homes have been desired by the adventurous settlers.

These removals, and the frontier collisions by which they have often been preceded, have led to frequent and disastrous conflicts between the races.

It is profitless to discuss here which of them has been chiefly responsible for the disturbances whose recital occupies so large a space upon the pages of our history.

We have to deal with the appalling fact that though thousands of lives have been sacrificed, and hundreds of millions of dollars expended in the attempt to solve the Indian problem, it has until within the past few years seemed scarcely nearer a solution than it was half a century ago. But the government has of late been cautiously but steadily feeling its way to the adoption of a policy which has already produced gratifying results, and which, in my judgment, is likely, if Congress and the Executive accord in its support, to relieve us ere long from the difficulties which have hitherto beset us.

For the success of the efforts now making to introduce among the Indians the customs and pursuits of civilized life, and gradually to absorb them into the mass of our citizens, sharing their rights and holden to their responsibilities, there is imperative need for legislative action.

My suggestions in that regard will be chiefly such as have been already called to the attention of Congress, and have received to some extent its consideration:

First. I recommend the passage of an act making the laws of the various States and Territories applicable to the Indian reservations within their borders, and extending the laws of the State of Arkansas to the portion of the Indian Territory not occupied by the five civilized tribes.

The Indian should receive the protection of the law. He should be allowed to maintain in court his rights of person and property. He has repeatedly begged for this privilege. Its exercise would be very valuable to him in his progress toward civilization.

Second. Of even greater importance is a measure which has been frequently recommended by my predecessors in office, and in furtherance of which several bills have been from time to time introduced in both Houses of Congress. The enactment of a general law permitting the allotment in severalty, to such Indians, at least, as desire it, of a reasonable quantity of land secured to them by patent, and for their own protection made inalienable for twenty or twenty-five years, is demanded for their present welfare and their permanent advancement.

In return for such considerate action on the part of the government, there is reason to believe that the Indians in large numbers would be persuaded to sever their tribal relations and to engage at once in agricultural pursuits. Many of them realize the fact that their hunting days are over, and that it is now for their best interests to conform their manner of life to the new order of things. By no greater inducement than the assurance of permanent title to the soil can they be led to engage in the occupation of tilling it.

The well-attested reports of their increasing interest in husbandry justify the hope and belief that the enactment of such a statute as I recommend would be at once attended with gratifying results. A resort to the allotment system would have a direct and powerful influence in dissolving the tribal bond, which is so prominent a feature of savage life, and which tends so strongly to perpetuate it.

Third. I advise a liberal appropriation for the support of Indian schools, because of my confident belief that such a course is consistent with the wisest economy.

Even among the most uncultivated Indian tribes there is reported to be a general and urgent desire on the part of the chiefs and older members for the education of their children. It is unfortunate, in view of this fact, that during the past year the means which have been at the command of the Interior Department for the purpose of Indian instruction have proved to be utterly inadequate. The success of the schools which are in operation at Hampton, Carlisle, and Forest Grove should not only encourage a more generous provision for the support of those institutions, but should prompt the establishment of others of a similar character.

They are doubtless much more potent for good than the day schools upon the reservation, as the pupils are altogether separated from the surroundings of savage life, and brought into constant contact with civilization.

There are many other phases of this subject which are of great interest, but which cannot be included within the becoming limits of this communication; they are discussed ably in the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

For many years the Executive, in his annual message to Congress, has urged the necessity of stringent legislation for the suppression of polygamy in the Territories, and especially in the Territory of Utah. The existing statute for the punishment of this odious crime, so revolting to the moral and religious sense of Christendom, has been persistently and contemptuously violated ever since its enactment. Indeed, in spite of commendable efforts on the part of the authorities who represent the United States in that Territory, the law has in very rare instances been enforced, and, for a cause to which reference will presently be made, is practically a dead letter.

The fact that adherents of the Mormon church, which rests upon polygamy as its corner-stone, have recently been peopling in large numbers Idaho, Arizona, and other of our Western Territories, is well calculated to excite the liveliest interest and apprehension. It imposes upon Congress and the Executive the duty of arraying against this barbarous system all the power which, under the Constitution and the law, they can wield for its destruction.

Reference has been already made to the obstacles which the United States officers have encountered in their efforts to punish violations of law. Prominent among these obstacles is the difficulty of procuring legal evidence sufficient to warrant a conviction even in the case of the most notorious offenders.

Your attention is called to a recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, explaining its judgment of reversal in the case of Miles, who had been convicted of bigamy in Utah. The court refers to the fact that the secrecy attending the celebration of marriages in that Territory makes the proof of polygamy very difficult; and the propriety is suggested of modifying the law of evidence which now makes a wife incompetent to testify against her husband.

This suggestion is approved. I recommend also the passage of an act providing that in the Territories of the United States the fact that a woman has been married to a person charged with bigamy shall not disqualify her as a witness upon his trial for that offense. I further recommend legislation by which any person solemnizing a marriage in any of the Territories shall be required, under stringent penalties for neglect or refusal, to file a certificate of such marriage in the supreme court of the Territory.

Doubtless Congress may devise other practicable measures for obviating the difficulties which have hitherto attended the efforts to suppress this iniquity. I assure you of my determined purpose to co-operate with you in any lawful and discreet measures which may be proposed to that end.

Although our system of government does not contemplate that the nation should provide or support a system for the education of our people, no measures calculated to promote that general intelligence and virtue upon which the perpetuity of our institutions so greatly depends, have ever been regarded with indifference by Congress or the Executive.

A large portion of the public domain has been, from time to time, devoted to the promotion of education.

There is now a special reason why, by setting apart the proceeds of its sales of public lands, or by some other course, the government should aid the work of education. Many who now exercise the right of suffrage are unable to read the ballot which they cast. Upon many who had just emerged from a condition of slavery, were suddenly devolved the responsibilities of citizenship in that portion of the country most impoverished by war. I have been pleased to learn from the report of the Commissioner of Education that there has lately been a commendable increase of interest and effort for their instruction; but all that can be done by local legislation and private generosity should be supplemented by such aid as can be constitutionally afforded by the national government.

I would suggest that if any fund be dedicated to this purpose it may be wisely distributed in the different States according to the ratio of illiteracy, as by this means those localities which are most in need of such assistance will reap its special benefits.

The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture exhibits the results of the experiments in which that department has been engaged during the past year, and makes important suggestions in reference to the agricultural development of the country.

The steady increase of our population, and the consequent addition to the number of those engaging in the pursuit of husbandry, are giving to this Department a growing dignity and importance. The Commissioner's suggestions touching its capacity for greater usefulness deserve attention, as it more and more commends itself to the interests which it was created to promote.

It appears from the report of the Commissioner of Pension that, since 1860, 789,063 original pension claims have been filed; 450,949 of these have been allowed and inscribed on the pension-roll; 72,539 have been rejected and abandoned, being 13+ per cent. of the whole number of claims settled.

There are now pending for settlement 265,575 original pension claims, 227,040 of which were filed prior to July 1, 1880. These, when allowed, will involve the payment of arrears from the date of discharge in case of an invalid, and from date of death or termination of a prior right in all other cases.

From all the data obtainable it is estimated that 15 per cent. of the number of claims now pending will be rejected or abandoned. This would show the probable rejection of 34,040 cases, and the probable admission of about 193,000 claims, all of which involve the payment of arrears of pension.

With the present force employed, the number of adjudications remaining the same and no new business intervening, this number of claims (193,000) could be acted upon in a period of six years; and taking January 1, 1884, as a near period from which to estimate in each case an average amount of arrears, it is found that every case allowed would require, for the first payment upon it, the sum of $1,350. Multiplying this amount by the whole number of probable admissions gives $250,000,000 as the sum required for first payments. This represents the sum which must be paid upon claims which were filed before July 1, 1880, and are now pending, and entitled to the benefits of the arrears act. From this amount ($250,000,000) may be deducted from ten to fifteen millions, for cases where, the claimant dying, there is no person who, under the law, would be entitled to succeed to the pension, leaving $235,000,000 as the probable amount to be paid.

In these estimates, no account has been taken of the 38,500 cases filed since June 30, 1880, and now pending, which must receive attention as current business, but which do not involve the payment of any arrears beyond the date of filing the claim. Of this number it is estimated that 86 per cent. will be allowed.

As has been stated, with the present force of the Pension Bureau, 675 clerks, it is estimated that it will take six years to dispose of the claims now pending.

It is stated by the Commissioner of Pensions that by an addition of 250 clerks (increasing the adjudicating force rather than the mechanical) double the amount of work could be accomplished, so that these cases could be acted upon within three years.

Aside from the considerations of justice which may be urged for a speedy settlement of the claims now on the files of the Pension Office, it is no less important on the score of economy, inasmuch as fully one-third of the clerical force of the office is now wholly occupied in giving attention to correspondence with the thousands of claimants whose cases have been on the files for the past eighteen years. The fact that a sum so enormous must be expended by the Government to meet demands for arrears of pensions, is an admonition to Congress and the Executive to give cautious consideration to any similar project in the future. The great temptation to the presentation of fictitious claims afforded by the fact that the average sum obtained upon each application is $1,300, leads me to suggest the propriety of making some special appropriation for the prevention of fraud.

I advise appropriations for such internal improvements as the wisdom of Congress may deem to be of public importance. The necessity of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River justifies a special allusion to that subject. I suggest the adoption of some measure for the removal of obstructions which now impede the navigation of that great channel of commorce.

In my letter accepting the nomination for the Vice-Presidency, I stated that in my judgment "no man should be the incumbent of an office, the duties of which he is for any cause unfit to perform; who is lacking in the ability, fidelity, or integrity which a proper administration of such office demands. This sentiment would doubtless meet with general acquiescence, but opinion has been widely divided upon the wisdom and practicability of the various reformatory schemes which have been suggested and of certain proposed regulations governing appointments to public office.

"The efficiency of such regulations has been distrusted, mainly because they have seemed to exalt mere educational and abstract tests above general business capacity and even special fitness for the particular work in hand. It seems to me that the rules which should be applied to the management of the public service, may properly conform in the main to such as regulate the conduct of successful private business:

"Original appointments should be based upon ascertained fitness.

"The tenure of office should be stable.

"Positions of responsibility should, so far as practicable, be filled by the promotion of worthy and efficient officers.

"The investigation of all complaints and the punishment of all official misconduct should be prompt and thorough."

The views expressed in the foregoing letter are those which will govern my administration of the Executive Office. They are doubtless shared by all intelligent and patriotic citizens, however divergent in their opinions as to the best methods of putting them into practical operation.

For example, the assertion that "original appointments should be based upon ascertained fitness" is not open to dispute.

But the question how in practice such fitness can be most effectually ascertained, is one which has for years excited interest and discussion. The measure, which, with slight variations in its details, has lately been urged upon the attention of Congress and the Executive, has as its principal feature the scheme of competitive examination. Save for certain exceptions, which need not here be specified, this plan would allow admission to the service only in its lowest grade, and would accordingly demand that all vacancies in higher positions should be filled by promotion alone. In these particulars it is in conformity with the existing civil-service system of Great Britain. And indeed the success which has attended that system in the country of its birth is the strongest argument which has been urged for its adoption here.

The fact should not, however, be overlooked that there are certain features of the English system which have not generally been received with favor in this country, even among the foremost advocates of civil-service reform.

Among them are:

1. A tenure of office which is substantially a life-tenure.

2. A limitation of the maximum age at which an applicant can enter the service, whereby all men in middle life or older, are, with some exceptions, rigidly excluded.

3. A retiring allowance upon going out of office.

These three elements are as important factors of the problem as any of the others. To eliminate them from the English system would effect a most radical change in its theory and practice.

The avowed purpose of that system is to induce the educated young men of the country to devote their lives to public employment by an assurance that having once entered upon it they need never leave it, and that after voluntary retirement they shall be the recipients of an annual pension. That this system as an entirety has proved very successful in Great Britain seems to be generally conceded even by those who once opposed its adoption.

To a statute which should incorporate all its essential features, I should feel bound to give my approval. But whether it would be for the best interests of the public to fix upon an expedient for immediate and extensive application, which embraces certain features of the English system but excludes or ignores others of equal importance, may be seriously doubted, even by those who are impressed, as I am myself, with the grave importance of correcting the evils which inhere in the present methods of appointment.

If, for example, the English rule which shuts out persons above the age of twenty-five years from a large number of public employments is not to be made an essential part of our own system, it is questionable whether the attainment of the highest number of marks at a competitive examination should be the criterion by which all applications for appointment should be put to test. And under similar conditions, it may also be questioned, whether admission to the service should be strictly limited to its lowest ranks.

There are very many characteristics which go to make a model civil servant. Prominent among them are probity, industry, good sense, good habits, good temper, patience, order, courtesy, tact, self-reliance, manly deference to superior officers and manly consideration for inferiors. The absence of these traits is not supplied by wide knowledge of books or by promptitude in answering questions, or by any other quality likely to be brought to light by competitive examination.

To make success in such a contest, therefore, an indispensable condition of public employment, would very likely result in the practical exclusion of the older applicants, even though they might possess qualifications far superior to their younger and more brilliant competitors.

These suggestions must not be regarded as evincing any spirit of opposition to the competitive plan, which has been to some extent successfully employed already, and which may hereafter vindicate the claim of its most earnest supporters. But it ought to be seriously considered whether the application of the same educational standard to persons of mature years and to young men fresh from school and college would not be likely to exalt mere intellectual proficiency above other qualities of equal or greater importance.

Another feature of the proposed system is the selection by promotion of all officers of the government above the lowest grade, except such as would fairly be regarded as exponents of the policy of the Executive and the principles of the dominant party.

To afford encouragement to faithful public servants by exciting in their minds the hope of promotion, if they are found to merit it, is much to be desired.

But would it be wise to adopt a rule so rigid as to permit no other mode of supplying the intermediate walks of the service?

There are many persons who fill subordinate positions with great credit, but lack those qualities which are requisite for higher posts of duty; and, besides, the modes of thought and action of one whose service in a governmental bureau has been long continued are often so cramped by routine procedure as almost to disqualify him from instituting changes required by the public interests. An infusion of new blood, from time to time, into the middle ranks of the service might be very beneficial in its results.

The subject under discussion is one of grave importance. The evils which are complained of cannot be eradicated at once; the work must be gradual.

The present English system is a growth of years, and was not created by a single stroke of executive or legislative action.

Its beginnings are found in an order in council, promulgated in 1855, and it was after patient and cautious scrutiny of its workings that fifteen years later it took its present shape.

Five years after the issuance of the order in council, and at a time when resort had been had to competitive examinations as an experiment much more extensively than has yet been the case in this country, a select committee of the House of Commons made a report to that house, which, declaring its approval of the competitive plan, deprecated, nevertheless, any precipitancy in its general adoption as likely to endanger its ultimate success.

During this tentative period the results of the two methods of pass examination and competitive examination were closely watched and compared. It may be that before we confine ourselves upon this important question within the stringent bounds of statutory enactment, we may profitably await the result of further inquiry and experiment.

The submission of a portion of the nominations to a central board of examiners selected solely for testing the qualifications of applicants may, perhaps, without resort to the competitive test, put an end to the mischiefs which attend the present system of appointment, and it may be feasible to vest in such a board a wide discretion to ascertain the characteristics and attainments of candidates in those particulars which I have already referred to as being no less important than mere intellectual attainment.

If Congress should deem it advisable at the present session to establish competitive tests for admission to the service, no doubts such as have been suggested shall deter me from giving the measure my earnest support.

And I urgently recommend, should there be a failure to pass any other act upon this subject, that an appropriation of $25,000 per year may be made for the enforcement of section 1753 of the Revised Statutes.

With the aid thus afforded me, I shall strive to execute the provisions of that law according to its letter and spirit.

I am unwilling, in justice to the present civil servants of the government, to dismiss this subject without declaring my dissent from the severe and almost indiscriminate censure with which they have been recently assailed. That they are as a class indolent, inefficient, and corrupt, is a statement which has been often made and widely credited. But when the extent, variety, delicacy, and importance of their duties are considered, the great majority of the employés of the government are in my judgment deserving of high commendation.

The continuing decline of the merchant marine of the United States is greatly to be deplored. In view of the fact that we furnish so large a proportion of the freights of the commercial world and that our shipments are steadily and rapidly increasing, it is cause of surprise that not only is our navigation interest diminishing, but it is less than when our exports and imports were not half so large as now, either in bulk or value. There must be some peculiar hinderance to the development of this interest, or the enterprise and energy of American mechanics and capitalists would have kept this country at least abreast of our rivals in the friendly contest for ocean supremacy. The substitution of iron for wood and of steam for sail have wrought great revolutions in the carrying trade of the world; but these changes could not have been adverse to America if we had given to our navigation interests a portion of the aid and protection which have been so wisely bestowed upon our manufactures. I commend the whole subject to the wisdom of Congress, with the suggestion that no question of greater magnitude or farther-reaching importance can engage their attention.

In 1875 the Supreme Court of the United States declared unconstitutional the statutes of certain States which imposed upon ship-owners or consignees a tax of one dollar and a half for each passenger arriving from a foreign country, or, in lieu thereof, required a bond to indemnify the State and local authorities against expense for the future relief or support of such passenger. Since this decision the expense attending the care and supervision of immigrants has fallen on the States at whose ports they have landed. As a large majority of such immigrants, immediately upon their arrival, proceed to the inland States and the Territories to seek permanent homes, it is manifestly unjust to impose upon the State whose shores they first reach, the burden which it now bears. For this reason, and because of the national importance of the subject, I recommend legislation regarding the supervision and transitory care of immigrants at the ports of debarkation.

I regret to state that the people of Alaska have reason to complain that they are as yet unprovided with any form of government by which life or property can be protected. While the extent of its population does not justify the application of the costly machinery of Territorial administration, there is immediate necessity for constituting such a form of government as will promote the education of the people and secure the administration of justice.

The Senate, at its last session, passed a bill providing for the construction of a building for the Library of Congress, but it failed to become a law. The provision of suitable protection for this great collection of books, and for the copyright department connected with it, has become a subject of national importance and should receive prompt attention.

The report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, herewith transmitted, will inform you fully of the condition of the affairs of the District.

They urge the vital importance of legislation for the reclamation and improvement of the marshes and for the establishment of the harbor lines along the Potomac River front.

It is represented that in their present condition these marshes seriously affect the health of the residents of the adjacent parts of the city; and that they greatly mar the general aspect of the park in which stands the Washington Monument. This improvement would add to that park and to the park south of the Executive Mansion a large area of valuable land, and would transform what is now believed to be a dangerous nuisance into an attractive landscape extending to the river front.

They recommend the removal of the steam railway lines from the surface of the streets of the city, and the location of the necessary depots in such places as may be convenient for the public accommodation; and they call attention to the deficiency of the water supply, which seriously affects the material prosperity of the city and the health and comfort of its inhabitants.

I commend these subjects to your favorable consideration.

The importance of timely legislation with respect to the ascertainment and declaration of the vote for Presidential electors was sharply called to the attention of the people more than four years ago.

It is to be hoped that some well-defined measure may be devised before another national election, which will render unnecessary a resort to any expedient of a temporary character, for the determination of questions upon contested returns.

Questions which concern the very existence of the government and the liberties of the people were suggested by the prolonged illness of the late President, and his consequent incapacity to perform the functions of his office.

It is provided by the second article of the Constitution, in the fifth clause of its first section, that "in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President."

What is the intendment of the Constitution in its specification of "inability to discharge the powers and duties of said office," as one of the contingencies which calls the Vice-President to the exercise of Presidential functions?

Is the inability limited in its nature to long-continued intellectual incapacity, or has it a broader import?

What must be its extent and duration?

How must its existence be established?

Has the President, whose inability is the subject of inquiry, any voice in determining whether or not it exists, or is the decision of that momentous and delicate question confided to the Vice-President, or is it contemplated by the Constitution that Congress should provide by law precisely what should constitute inability, and how and by what tribunal or authority it should be ascertained?

If the inability proves to be temporary in its nature, and during its continuance the Vice-President lawfully exercises the functions of the Executive, by what tenure does he hold his office?

Does he continue as President for the remainder of the four years' term?

Or would the elected President, if his inability should cease in the interval, be empowered to resume his office?

And if having such lawful authority he should exercise it, would the Vice-President be thereupon empowered to resume his powers and duties as such?

I cannot doubt that these important questions will receive your early and thoughtful consideration.

Deeply impressed with the gravity of the responsibilities which have so unexpectedly devolved upon me, it will be my constant purpose to cooperate with you in such measures as will promote the glory of the country and the prosperity of its people.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

103	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Kilpatrick (No. 13).	Nov. 22	Peace question: His note to the foreign office to allay apprehension and correct false impression produced by the United States minister at Lima strongly disapproved; Chili had no grounds for apprehension, and should not have applied to legation; her course in suppressing Calderon government unintelligible in view of her previous assurances, reported in legation's No. 3; arrest of Calderon regretted; hopes it is not intended as a rebuke to the United States on account of differences between him and his colleague at Lima; a special envoy will be sent to endeavor to arrange a peace; reply to No. 8.	139
104	Same to same (telegram)....	Nov. 25	Calderon government: Its suppression and arrest of President Calderon are not understood by United States; special envoy leaves Washington for Chili immediately, and it is hoped that further action will await his arrival.	141
105	Same to same (No. 16).....	Nov. 30	Relieves him of negotiations for solution of peace question; informs him as to appointment and powers of Mr. Trescot as special envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to conduct such negotiations; appointment of Third Assistant Secretary of State as assistant to Mr. Trescot; Mr. Kilpatrick expected to aid Mr. Trescot.	141
106	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Trescot (No. 1).	Nov. 30	Personal instructions as special envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Chili, Peru, and Bolivia to negotiate for solution of peace question.	142
107	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Walker Blaine.	Nov. 30	Personal instruction as attaché to special mission for settlement of the peace question.	143
108	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Trescot (No. 2).	Dec. 1	Reviews previous instructions and steps which led to recognition of Calderon government; the act an adoption of policy friendly to Chili; it was followed by Chilian military order forbidding Calderon government to exercise its functions; President will not assume this as done in consequence of the recognition by the United States; if such a motive should be avowed, Mr. Trescot instructed to say that it is regarded as an intentional offense, and to suspend diplomatic intercourse, but he may receive any explanation which does not involve a disavowal of Mr. Hurlbut. The United States wishes first to stop bloodshed and misery; second, to take care that the Government of the United States is treated with the consideration to which it is entitled, and would be satisfied with manifestation of purpose in Chili either to restore Calderon government or establish one which will be allowed freedom of action in negotiations. Should Chili refuse to allow formation of government not pledged to consent to cession of territory, he is to express dissatisfaction of the United States. The United States recognizes Chili's right to adequate indemnity and guaranty, but that the exercise of the right of absolute conquest is dangerous; and the United States think that Peru has the right to demand an opportunity to find indemnity and guaranty without cession of territory. The prohibition of the formation of a government is practical extinction of the State. If good offices are refused on this basis, the United States holds itself free to appeal to the other republics of the continent to join with it. Instructions given in accordance, and a temporary convention counseled.	143
109	Mr. Kilpatrick to Mr. Blaine (No. 9).	Dec. 2	Peace question: Chili promised Mr. Kilpatrick that she would not demand cession of territory as absolute condition, and that she would build up and strengthen Calderon's government; these promises would have been fulfilled but for the representations made by Mr. Hurlbut of the attitude of the United States. 179	Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine (No. 212).	Sept. 14	Outward transmit-pass rules: Adjustment of this subject delayed; Chinese ministers proposed as concessions: 1st. Foreign goods admitted free of duty shipped coastwise should pay coast-trade duty; 2d. Goods from native produce bought at port should be subjected to the same restrictions as goods made from produce brought down under transit pass; useless to prolong negotiations on such a basis; incloses memorandum proposed and the provisional rules.	299
179	Same to same (No. 214)	Sept. 17	Interference with missionary work: Particulars of case of a native helper sent to Nang-chang-fu in which petty officials secretly oppose missionary work; steps taken in the premises; suggests whether such cases are not covered by treaty of Tientsin; note to Prince Kung.	308
180	Same to same (No. 217)	Sept. 24	Lekin tax and duty on imports: Proposition to abolish the lekin and increase of duty on imports from 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. will be accepted by Chinese Government; diplomatic body insist upon a provision for a court of reclamation for adjustment of claims for lekin improperly collected; Sir Thomas Wade's communication to foreign office and reply to same, proposing postponement of discussion of other provision.	310
181	Same to same (No. 218)	Sept. 27	Consumption of foreign opium in China: Report of imperial maritime customs. Efforts of the authorities, and laws prohibiting cultivation and consumption of opium do not lessen its use, because the revenue from its cultivation and importation are so great; so much is cultivated as to result in short supply of food. Officials say, "since we must receive the drug from abroad, why should not our people have the profit of raising it."	314
182	Mr. Hunter to Mr. Angell (No. 126).	Oct. 6	Purchase of land by foreigners at Canton: Minister's action on that subject approved.	316
183	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Angell (No. 128).	Oct. 28	Trade regulations on the Yang-tse: Decision of Chinese Government as applicable to junks on that river, is satisfactory to the department in view of the facts before it.	316
184	Same to same (No. 135)	Nov. 17	Consular courts in China: Minister's action respecting modification of regulations, so as to provide for constructive service of process on absent defendants in actions approved.	317
185	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Holcombe (No. 137).	Nov. 23	Attack upon American mission at Tsi-nanfu: The protection of American missionaries must be left largely to the discretion of the United States minister; but that a spirit of justice should prompt the Chinese Government to put a stop to these annoyances.	317
186	Same to same (No. 142)	Dec. 10	Great Northern Telegraph Company: The time has come for Chinese Government to answer upon what terms it will grant permission to Americans to lay cables; United States would view in an unfriendly light any act which precluded our people from an equal share with other people in such an enterprise.	317

276	Mr. White to Mr. Evarts (No. 169).	Nov. 4	Naturalized American citizens: Case of Jacques Loeb, arrested, fined, and released; it is thought the German Government will bring his application for remission of fine under decision already made as to non-applicability of treaties of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine.	445
277	Mr. Evarts to Mr. White (No. 155).	Nov. 13	Sale of intoxicating liquors in the Ralik group of islands: Efforts of Chief Lebon and Evangelical Mission of Pacific, to check; United States hopes that German Government will instruct consul at Jaluit to aid native government in enforcement of the law; also the alleged complicity of German consul in violations of the ordinance.	445
278	Mr. White to Mr. Evarts, (No. 170).	Nov. 13	Naturalized American citizens: Letter of Aaron Weill, informing of his release under treaty of 1868, of Alsace-Lorraine, and asking further advice, which was declined.	446
279	Mr. Everett to Mr. Evarts (No. 4).	Nov. 22	Naturalized American citizens: Reports that Aaron Weill's fine has been remitted by pardon; and pardon granted in case of Alois Gehres for alleged violation of military duty; thinks cases will stand as precedents.	447
280	Mr. Evarts to Mr. White, (No. 161).	Dec. 1	Naturalized Americans arrested in Germany: Application to be made to imperial government for adoption of some general rule for disposition of cases of Germans who have become naturalized citizens of the United States, to obviate the over-zealous arrest made on ground of military service, when visiting Germany on pleasure or business.	448
281	Mr. Everett to Mr. Evarts (No. 7).	Dec. 9	Naturalized American citizens: Question of applicability of treaty of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine. German Government cannot, as a general principle, admit its non-applicability to cases in Alsace-Lorraine; to do so would compel the government to set aside laws of that province; it could be accomplished by a supplementary convention, not by "additional treaty" as suggested by Mr. White.	449
282	Same to same (No. 10)	Dec. 20	Naturalized American citizens: The applicability of existing treaty to Alsace-Lorraine; Germany is ready to receive proposals from United States for a convention to extend the existing treaty to Alsace-Lorraine; cases heretofore decided are not to be considered as influencing future cases; ten years' absence necessary to release an emigrant from duty to his original country; public opinion is that the attempt to change the treaty would fail.	450

283	Mr. Hay to Mr. Everett (No. 165.)	Dec. 22	Spurious diplomas from America: Prosecution of individuals concerned in sale of; P. E. C. Volland's, issued in violation of charter of American University, whose case resulted in abolishing the charter of American University; papers to be transmitted to foreign office for use in prosecution of Volland.	451
284	Mr. Evarts to Mr. Everett (No. 169.)	Dec. 30	Naturalized citizens arrested for military service: Approves action of Minister White in case of Loeb, arrested and fined for avoidance of military duty; concurs in view that United States cannot assent to the doctrine of non-applicability of treaties of 1868 to Alsace and Lorraine; press Loeb's case upon Imperial government until favorable disposition is secured.	452
285	Mr. Everett to Mr. Evarts (No. 21.)	Jan. 17	American citizens, question of arrest of, in Germany: imperial government says that the difficulty is in distinguishing between the bona-fide and dishonest returning emigrants; that it is the duty of local officials to refer all cases to their chiefs in Berlin; declines to reply to suggestion of modifying local laws of Alsace-Lorraine, until answer was received to proposals for a supplementary treaty.	452
286	Mr. White to Mr. Evarts. (No. 182.)	Feb. 21	Opening of the Reichstag: Speech from the throne proposing bill for the relief of working classes; of direct taxation; change of law regarding crimes committed during intoxication; the creation of a system of guilds and trade corporations, and a system of insurance by the state of certain classes of workmen; these bills presented with declaration that is redemption of promise made at introduction of socialist law of 1878.	453
287	Mr. White to Mr. Blaine. (No. 188.)	Mar. 7	Prussian Economic Council: Royal decree for establishment of; its purposes, powers, and composition; it will be an efficient aid in formulating measures for the interests of trade, agriculture, and commerce; Prince Bismarck proposes a similar one, the Imperial Economic Council.	461
288	Same to same (No. 191).....	Mar. 14	Naturalized American citizens: Arrest or fine of, returning to Germany on account of liability to military service; fewer cases than in 1880; correspondence with the office of minister of foreign affairs inclosed.	463
289	Same to same (No. 205).....	Apr. 29	Anti-Jewish movement: History of; the main factor is the envy of the Jews and their supposed anti-Germanic and socialistic tendencies; the measures proposed for organization of guilds and compulsory insurance of workingmen will counteract this.	465
290	Same to same (No. 209).....	June 1	Naturalized American citizens: Fine imposed on Jacques Loeb remitted on the theory that he is no longer a citizen of Alsace-Lorraine, having been naturalized in America. This indicates an acquiescence in the doctrine of the relinquishment of requirement of ten years' residence abroad before a person leaving those provinces can be considered to have thrown off his German allegiance.	471
291	Same to same (No. 215).....	June 30	Naturalized American citizens: Report of military cases settled during year 1880 and first half of 1881.	472
292	Mr. Blaine to Mr. White (No. 237).	July 25	Naturalized Germans: Abstract of cases for half of 1881 of naturalized citizens arrested for military service received. Department approves minister's action in these cases, and commends his zeal.	477
293	Mr. Blaine to Mr. White	July 30	Yorktown Centennial celebration: The President tenders to the representatives of the family of Baron Steuben an earnest invitation to attend.	477
294	Mr. White to Mr. Blaine (No. 239).	Aug. 15	Constitution and administration of affairs of city of Berlin: Report of subjects: (1) relations of city government to that of the State; (2) citizenship and voters; (3) city council organization and jurisdiction; (4) magistracy, election, organization, and jurisdiction; (5) committees; (6) streets; (7) public lighting; (8) sewerage; (9) care of poor; (10) police department.	478

295	Mr. Everett to Mr. Blaine (No. 247).	Aug. 29	Yorktown Centennial celebration: Delivered invitation to the representatives of late Baron Steuben to take part in; awaits instruction as to mode of conveyance of the invited guests to the United States.	489
296	Same to same (No. 254).....	Sept. 27	Yorktown Centennial celebration: List of German guests who will attend; expression of satisfaction of the Emperor, Prince Bismarck, and the German people, at the honor conferred by the United States in extending the invitation.	490
297	Mr. Hunter to Mr. Everett (No. 268).	Oct. 20	Yorktown Centennial celebration: Approves action of the minister in securing passage in the "Herder" for the representatives of Steuben family, at the expense of the United States.	492

GREAT BRITAIN.

298	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Evarts (No. 115).	Jan. 7	Opening of Parliament: Queen's speech; land league and coercion discussed; leaders of Irish opinion do not hope for its independence, and will be content with a thorough reform in land laws and modified local self-government as suggested in speech from throne.	492
299	Mr. Evarts to Mr. Lowell (No. 99).	Jan. 14	Wreck of American Ship James Baily: Plundering of the ship by natives off the coast of Hainan; thanks of United States to be conveyed to Mr. James Scott, acting British consul, in bringing matter to attention of Chinese authorities, and securing dispatch of war vessel to protect the wreck.	495
300	Same to same (No. 102).....	Jan. 20	Land law agitation in Ireland: United States trusts that the statesmanlike policy of the rulers of the United Kingdom will soon restore perfect tranquility to so important part of Her Majesty's dominions.	496
301	Same to same (No. 109).....	Feb. 4	American fishery claims: Affidavits in cases of vessels prevented from fishing in Newfoundland waters; the question is, shall fishermen United States be compelled to purchase bait of Provincial fishermen; United States views these repeated acts as an abrogation of the treaty, and the delay of settlement of Fortune Bay claims strengthens the idea that Her Majesty's Government has not condemned these interferences; that United States presses the claims for full compensation.	496
302	Same to same (No. 110).....	Feb. 4	American fishery claims: Separation of question of damages from that of construction of treaty, came from Great Britain; United States will accept proposition to submit question of damages to award of referees, views of treaty not to be accepted; delay results in Provincial fishermen believing Her Majesty's Government justifies outrages at Fortune Bay; recites history of disturbances and negotiation for adjustment; negotiation resumed on questions of construction of treaty, and compensation for unlawful violence separated; basing the latter solely on the wrong done to American fishermen free of any limitation by treaty.	499
303	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Evarts (No. 130).	Feb. 22	American fishery claims: Lord Granville signifies willingness to accept proposition to submit to Sir Edward Thornton and Mr. Evarts; wished to know if this government would consider an offer of damages in solido.	502
304	Same to same (No. 132).....	Feb. 26	House of Commons: Coercion bill passed its third reading; indiscreet action of Irish leaders has weakened them in England and Ireland; Parnell accused of treating with Paris communists injured his cause very much.	504
305	Mr. Evarts to Mr. Lowell (telegram).	Mar. 2	American fishery claims: Secretary's offer as accepted was £15,000 for Fortune Bay and claims in No. 109; assurance given that this amount covered all claims within the knowledge of either government; no modification possible; if money is not paid claims of Nos. 109 and 110 will be pressed for settlement as independent claims.	504

306	Mr. Evarts to Mr. Lowell (telegram).	Mar. 5	American fishery claims: Inquires if Great Britain will submit question of damages to Secretary of State and British Minister; will receive a proposition for $80,000 for Fortune Bay claims and $1,500 for the others.	505
307	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 138).	Mar. 5	American fishery claim: Correspondence with Lord Granville; offer of £15,000 in compensation for Fortune Bay claims, and two in dispatch No. 109, to be accepted in full of all claims hitherto presented, provided amount is placed at immediate disposal of United States Government and without prejudice to question of rights under treaty of Washington.	506
308	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (telegram).	Mar. 8	American fishery claims: Mr. Evarts' remark about advertising for claims to avoid sacrificing just claims of unknown parties; simple question is, whether Lord Granville will adjust the claims in 109 and 110 either by payment of lump sum or by reference to British minister and Secretary of State.	510
309	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (telegram).	Mar. 9	American fishery claims: English cabinet is willing to submit claim to reference as proposed by Mr. Evarts, or to pay the £15,000; if cruisers are sent as intimated, would like to know United States' opinion of joint cruisers with joint instructions.	510
310	Same to same (No. 139)	Mar. 9	American pork: False statement of trichinæ in; privy council answered inquiry relative to, in the negative.	510
311	Same to same (No. 140).	Mar. 12	Naturalized American citizens: Case of Mr. Boyton, arrested at Kildare; Consul Barrow instructed to ascertain if Boyton was an American citizen; and if that, and his innocence were made out, to apply for his discharge.	511
312	Same to same (No. 141)	Mar. 12	American fishery claims: Interview with Lord Granville; he thinks Parliament will not approve of payment of £15,000 except as payment in full.	514
313	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (telegram).	Mar. 14	American fishery claims: Proposition to refer matter to Sir E. Thornton and Secretary of State is accepted; subject of joint cruisers may also be referred, or postponed.	514
314	Same to same (telegram)....	Mar. 16	American pork: Mr. Noyes will send copy of Department's dispatch respecting injurious rumors touching.	515
315	Same to same (No. 130).....	Mar. 17	American pork: Mr. Evart's denial of published statements of mortality among swine; interview with British representatives, and correspondence with British minister; from which it appears that Mr. Crump confounds hog cholera with trichinosis, and has been mistaken or misled by designing speculators in inflicting injury to pork market; that despite the admission of British minister that Mr. Crump's statements are exaggerated and the positive denial made by this Department, United States looks to Her Majesty's Government to aid in counteracting the evil effects of Mr. Crump's action.	515
316	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 144).	Mar. 21	Naturalized American citizens: Case of Boyton; correspondence with consul and Boyton showing discrepancy in passport papers and present account of age and birthplace; no evidence of he, or his father, having been naturalized, though born in Ireland.	517
317	Same to same (No. 147).....	Mar. 25	Naturalized American citizens: Construction of section 2066, 1862, Revised Statutes United States on subject of naturalization of soldier alien.	521
318	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 138).	Mar. 31	Naturalized American citizens: Department approves action in case of Michael P. Boyton's application for new passport; wisdom of policy of so acting as to avoid unduly embarrassing an American citizen, or hindering his protection, and at the same time to guard against bringing any element of uncertainty into the discussion of questions of such gravity.	523
319	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 154).	Apr. 7	Naturalized American citizens: Boyton's letter and transcript of record inclosed.	524
320	Same to same (No. 161).....	Apr. 9	American pork and cattle: Note to Lord Granville urging importance of authoritative correction of statements of Mr. Crump as to diseased condition of American pork and cattle.	555

321	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 163).	Apr. 13	American pork: Note from Lord Granville and memorandum by Mr. Warrack, British vice-consul at Chicago, giving official sources of information to Mr. Crump upon which Lord Granville considers Mr. Crump's statements justified, but is willing to receive trustworthy evidence as to the existence of hog disease.	527
322	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 166).	May 26	Naturalized American citizens: Arrest, under "coercion act," of Michael P. Boyton; unless he establishes citizenship United States cannot intervene; while the fact of American citizenship could not of itself exempt one from penalties of the act, a speedy trial or release could be demanded; the act is in some sense ex post facto, in others confers arbitrary powers.	530
323	Same to same (No. 168).....	May 27	Native-born American citizen: Joseph D'Alton, alleged to be, arrested under "coercion act"; hypothetical instruction based on Boyton's case, will indicate treatment of D'Alton's case.	531
324	Same to same (No. 172).....	June 2	Naturalized American citizens: Arrest of Joseph B. Walsh under the "Protection Act"; certificate of naturalization and letter of Hon. S. J. Randall in relation thereto; while United States has no disposition to interfere in the local administration of affairs in Great Britain, it cannot view with indifference the summary treatment of its naturalized citizens; if Walsh's case calls for interference, make such efforts as will result in speedy trial or release.	532
325	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 193).	June 4	Coercion act, arrest naturalized Americans under: In case of Walsh, that Great Britain, while appreciating solicitude of United States at enforcement of "Protection Act" by unusual measures upon American citizens, sees no grounds for treating Americans better than British subjects were treated, and declines to give definite answer until fuller instructions to Mr. Lowell; not deemed it prudent to protest, it being reported that Mr. Walsh had acted as if he were a British subject.	533
326	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 180).	June 10	American pork: Result of investigation justifies the denial of the statement of Mr. Crump of the diseased condition of; so far from the representations of instruction No. 130 being "an insinuation against the good faith of that gentleman," it shows that in confounding hog cholera with trichinosis he was misled, being influenced by the widely spread newspaper and other communications on the subject; if Mr. Crump's good faith had been doubted United States would have protected itself accordingly with suspension or revocation of Mr. Crump's official character.	534
327	Same to same (No. 183)	June 17	American cattle: papers showing falsity of charge of foot and mouth disease in, condemned at Liverpool; further investigation to be made by Mr. Lyman; after investigation such representations to British Government should be made as may be justified by the facts.	536
328	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 205).	June 18	"Coercion Act," arrest of naturalized citizens under: Note to Lord Granville asking for particulars of, of Mr. D'Alton and Walsh under "Coercion Act."	537
329	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 187).	June 24	Interoceanic canal: Joint guaranty of neutrality of, by European powers; attention of Her Majesty's Government to be called to treaty of 1846; any guaranty supplemental to that of United States in that treaty must be deemed an intrusion where interests of United States and Colombia are superior to those of any other; United States asserts political control; joint control by European powers of what is a part of United States objectionable to United States; this not a new policy but an adherence to principles of long standing.	537

330	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 218).	July 15	Coercion act, arrests under: Cases of Joseph D'Alton and Joseph B. Walsh following instruction No. 168, as Mr. D'Alton has furnished no proofs of citizenship no action has been had in his case. In case Walsh, Lord Granville refuses to furnish any particulars; as soon particulars are obtained will take such action as facts justify; incloses correspondence.	540
331	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 206).	July 30	Rights of American fishermen to request of Her Majesty's Government to protect American fishermen in the rights secured by treaty to fish and bait, as there is a manifest disposition on the part of the native fishermen and local authorities to disturb the Americans by force.	544
332	Mr. Lowell to Mr. Blaine (No. 235).	Aug. 11	"Coercion act," American citizens arrested under: Correspondence relative to the case of Mr. McEnery as a "suspect" and confined in Limerick jail. As it does not seem to be case of a citizen attending exclusively to his private business and abstaining from political affairs, the legation declined to act.	545
333	Mr. Hunter to Mr. Hoppin (No. 248).	Oct. 20	Customs on west coast of Africa: Practice of delivery of papers of American ships to, authorities of, at Sierra Leone; foreign office should be requested that the objectionable practice be discontinued or modified.	547
334	Same to same (No. 257)	Nov. 8	Customs on west coast of Africa: As to practice of, authorities of, with American ships; incloses copy of letter from Yates and Porterfield on same subject, and instructs that such communication be made to Her Majesty's Government as his judgment may dictate.	548
335	Mr. Hoppin to Mr. Blaine (No. 218).	Nov. 11	Interoceanic canal across the Isthmus: Relative to proposed guarantee of neutrality of; Lord Granville recognizes United States claim of right and duty to, under its treaty of 1846, and while declining to initiate any discussion, calls attention to the position of United States and Great Britain as to the canal as determined by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850.	549
336	Same to same (No. 219).....	Nov. 12	Lord mayor's day, honors to the American flag: Stars and Stripes borne in front of the lord mayor's carriage escorted by guard of staff sergeants of London militia; letter to Lord Granville and extract from the Daily Telegraph.	550
337	Same to same (No. 220).....	Nov. 14	"Coercion act," arrest of American citizens under: Discharge of Joseph B. Walsh from prison on account of the state of his health; inclosing correspondence relative to.	552
338	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 270).	Nov. 19	Interoceanic canal: Modification of Clayton-Bulwer treaty necessary because of the great development of the United States on the Pacific coast since the date of the treaty, and especially in view of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama, and the guarantee of United States of its neutrality; treaty is objectionable in conceding to Great Britain the control of any canal that may be constructed; it impeaches the long established claim of the United States to priority on the American continent; the danger that a third power may intervene and assume direction of the project, which by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is under the sole control of the United States and Great Britain. Modification proposed is, 1st, cancellation of that provision forbiding the United States fortifying and holding political control of the country; 2d, treating as absolute the provisions for treaty stipulations for joint protectorate over canal at Tehuantepec or Panama; 3d, definition of the distance within which captures might be made on high seas; United States objects to assent of European governments to the neutrality of the canal because it implies the right to resent. Directs that Lord Granville be informed at earliest opportunity of purpose of United States touching this treaty.	554

339	Mr. Hoppin to Mr. Blaine (No. 223).	Nov. 21	Rights of American fishermen in Newfoundland: Correspondence between the legation and Her Majesty's foreign office relative to.	560
340	Same to same (No. 224)	Nov. 25	Honors to the British flag at Yorktown celebration: Correspondence between Lord Granville and the United States legation relating to saluting British flag, and transmission of official copy of President Arthur's order to that effect.	562
341	Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lowell (No. 281).	Nov. 29	Interoceanic canal: Clayton-Bulwer treaty; proposal for modification of; historical objections to the treaty, and differences of opinion between Great Britain and the United States to which its interpretation has given rise; from the time of its conclusion in 1850 to the end of 1858 its provisions were thrice made the basis of proposals to arbitrate as to their meaning; modification and abrogation have alike been considered and its vexatious character recognized by both governments; had Great Britain's present interpretation been put on treaty at its inception it would never have been ratified; United States' proposal is to free itself from these embarrassing features, and leave it as its framers intended it should be, a perfect settlement of all possible issues between Great Britain and the United States with regard to Central America.	563
342	Same to same (No. 286)	Dec. 10	Hawaii: Foreign influence in; efforts of Great Britain to control commerce of, and to encourage coolie emigration to; Great Britain to be informed that the United States has felt justified in declaring to Hawaii that it is regarded as a part of the American system of states and key of Pacific trade, and would regard the intrusion of any non-American interest in Hawaii as inconsistent with United States' relations thereto.	569

Mr. Osborn to Señor Bernardo Iregoyen.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, October 22, 1880.

MR. MINISTER: The intelligence of the cessation of hostilities between the Government of the Argentine Republic and the Province of Buenos Ayres having been received at the Department of State, United States of America, I am requested by the honorable Secretary of State to express to your excellency the extreme gratification of the Government of the United States at the receipt of that intelligence.

I am also directed to say to your excellency that it had not been doubted by the Government of the United States that the administration and the people of the Argentine Republic and the authorities of the Province of Buenos Ayres would shortly reach the termination of those misunderstandings, which had brought about a situation of affairs in the territories of the republic so much to be deprecated, not only by its own citizens, but by the people of all other countries interested in the prosperity of the Argentine Republic.

I am further instructed to express to your excellency that from the result of the internal dissensions which threatened the stability of a sister republic, His Excellency the President of the United States is glad to conclude that the principle of national life, as opposed to the spirit of disintegration, will continue to animate its people, and to request your excellency to convey the sincere congratulations of his excellency upon the fortunate issue of the contentions to His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic.

I embrace this opportunity, &c.

THOS. O. OSBORN.

His excellency Dr. Don BERNARDO IREGOYEN,
Minister of Foreign Affairs

Señor Bernardo Iregoyen to Mr. Osborn.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC, Buenos Ayres, November 6, 1880.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to receive the note of your excellency, under date of October 22d past, and is my agreeable duty to signify to your excellency the great estimation in which His Excellency the President of the Republic holds and accepts the felicitations which the excellent Government of the United States has taken occasion to transmit on the re-establishment of the peace of the nation.

The sentiments of the government represented by your excellency, condemnatory of all secession spirit, are inspired by feelings of reciprocal sympathy, natural to two friendly governments, and by the harmony of the institutions of both countries, under the auspices of which a peace stable and permanent, will be established here.

It is in this normal and prosperous state, and under the sway of a moderate policy, that the President has the satisfacti on of receiving the very estimable felicitations of the government represented by your excellency.

Will you, Mr. Minister, please to transmit to His Excellency the President of the United States the sincere good wishes of the Argentine Government for the prosperity of that great nation, at the same time you will please accept the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

BERNARDO IREGOYEN.

His excellency General THOMAS O. OSBORN,
Minister of the United States.

[Inclosure C, in No. 308. Buenos Ayres Herald, November 14, 1880.]

UNITED STATES MINISTER OSBORN AND THE ARGENTINE PRESS.

General Osborn's letter congratulating the Argentine Government in the name of that of the United States has called forth some comment from the local press, of which we deem it worth while to translate the most remarkable paragraphs. Our colleague, La Republica, remarks as follows:

"It has been said that distance is equivalent to posterity. To judge an event from a distance, through space, is the same as to judge it after a lapse of time. The expression of an opinion on our affairs that comes from a far country, will be the same as that which will be formed here when time shall have calmed the excitement of momentary passion. The occasion of these lines is an event that is as grave as it is important to our foreign relations.

"The President of the United States, through his minister, has just congratulated the Argentine Government on the re-establishment of peace, that has established the full power of the nation, against the elements of separation and localism. The applause could not come invested with greater authority. It comes from the people whose institutions we have copied, and which we have frankly adopted as our model, on our journey through space and through time. It comes from the great nation that has had to bear similar contests and to go through similar experiences in order to establish forever the principle of its existence, one and indivisible. * * * Hence the note of the United States minister has been read with interest and with gratitude. The approbation of the United States Government that has thus been made public is without any doubt a moral force, because it is the greatest authority that can be invoked in support of the righteousness of a solution and of the patriotism and legitimacy of the motives that sought and arrived at it through so many difficulties. * * * We will say one word more. The United States minister might have fulfilled the friendly and well intentioned charge of his government in a visit to the President or to the minister of foreign affairs, but he has preferred to adopt the form of a 'note,' so as to make the fact more patent and that it might the more properly be made public. It is thus that the United States minister follows up the series of good offices that he has never grudged towards this country and our government since he came here to represent his own. The Argentine Government has not gone through one day of trial without having the United States Minister at its side. When the President and Congress removed to Belgrano, Mr. Osborn believed it to be his duty to surround the legitimate government of the nation with acts of deference and sympathy. His conduct in this sense is well known. * * * We have a biographical sketch of General Osborn, which we will translate and publish as a tribute of respect to the diplomatic minister that shows himself so good a friend to this nation and its government."

No. 313.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, January 13, 1881. (Received March 8.)

SIR: The Government of the United States of Colombia having addressed a note to this government informing it that a compact had been entered into between that government and Chili to submit all questions in dispute between them to arbitration, and at the same time invited the Argentine Government to join the other republics of South America by representation in a congress to meet in Colombia for the purpose of effecting similar compacts between the governments so represented, Dr. Iregoyen, Argentine minister of foreign affairs, in behalf of his government replied, under date of December 30th ultimo, a copy of which I have the honor to inclose herewith.

I have the honor, &c.,

THOS. O. OSBORN.

Señor Bernado Irigoyen to Señor Santa Maria.

[Buenos Ayres Herald, Jan. 13, 1881.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Buenos Ayres, December 30, 1880.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: The undersigned, minister and secretary of state in the department of foreign affairs, has the honor of receiving and making known to His Excellency the President of the Republic the note which, under date of the 11th October, his excellency the minister of foreign affairs of Colombia has been pleased to address to him, and he hereby does himself the pleasure of replying thereto.

The Argentine Government has experienced great satisfaction in view of the work effected between the United States of Colombia and the Republic of Chili, and it duly esteems the courtesy by which it is invited to adhere to the principles of arbitration embodied in the said convention. All stipulations tending to preserve the peace or consolidate the union existing among the states of this continent will always meet with the sincere sympathy of this republic, which, ever since the dawning of independence, has consecrated American fraternity among the rules of her international policy. Arbitration is certainly one of the noble aspirations of the present, and the Argentine Government can display the assent it granted long since to that formula which wisely consults the interests of justice together with all the generous demands of humanity. It had an opportunity of stipulating it with the Chilian Government in 1856, in order to settle the limits questions which then existed, and which might arise thereafter. In 1874 it declared its readiness, in documents which have been made public, that "it was willing, either through treaties or without them, to settle all international questions by arbitration," and, in accordance with this statement, it admitted the principle in 1876 to settle its controversy with Paraguay, after a long war, undertaken in deference to its honor and safety, and in which its arms, and those of its allies obtained a complete mastery over the pretensions of that nation. It would have been an easy thing for this republic to have reincorporated the territories in dispute definitely, and once for all, under the protection of the internal perturbations and of the indulgent policy adopted after the emancipation. But neither the facilities that intervened to consolidate the revindication, nor the knowledge the Argentine Government had of its perfect right, was sufficient to weaken the moderation that prevailed throughout in its dealings with its friendly states, and the undersigned may call to mind with true pride the fact that his government presented the lofty example of submitting to the decision of an impartial power its dominion over territories to which it considered itself with a perfect right, and which it regained at the cost of dearly bought victories.

"Peace is certainly one of the most special necessities in Spanish America," and it depends to-day on the foresight of the governments. Happily the day has gone by in which political combinations on this continent had for their principal object the preserving of their independence against foreign aggressions and machinations. Europe no longer harbors any thoughts of conquest or of chimerical vindications. Such thoughts have been abandoned in view of the insuperable action of the people; and if the continental congress suggested by Colombia is ever carried into effect, it will not be, probably, to sanction the essentially defensive programme which was prescribed by Bolivar. The alarms and doubts which awakened that patriotic idea in the mind of the liberator have vanished in the logical development of the nations. The demands of colonization, the great interests of commerce which make themselves felt on every hand, the facilities for communication and traffic that stand out among the advances of the age, and the liberality with which America makes those who were born in other parts of the world partakers of her wealth, are the beneficent influences by which the antagonistic feelings of both worlds are suppressed. But the efforts of these countries to insure order and to strengthen the genuine practice of republican institutions would surely be fruitless were armed conflicts, such as those alluded to by his excellency the minister of foreign affairs, to be easily brought about, and were it made possible to invest them with desolating circumstances such as are reprobated by humanity. It is, therefore, a noble thing to endeavor to prevent the dangers and the discredit by which they are followed, and the undersigned is charged to inform your excellency, Monsieur le Ministre, that in so laudable an undertaking Colombia may depend upon the cooperation of the Argentine nation, which, since its beginning, has ever been identified with the fortunes and vicissitudes of South America.

Notwithstanding this, however, the invitation which the undersigned has had the honor to receive, suggests a few observations of general interest, which he will endeavor to present in the frank spirit that must prevail in the mutual relations between nations which are happily connected with each other in any way. The Argentine Government recognizes in arbitration all the importance attributed to it by that of Columbia, but it does not think that the propounding of that principle is of itself sufficient to insure the bringing into being of the purposes expressed in the note to which this is the reply. In corroboration of this remark the undersigned may point out, with sorrow, the events at present in progress on the coast of the Pacific, the fires of which consume such a multitude of the elements of order and of a common prosperity.

Bolivia and Chili solemnly stipulated arbitration, and in spite of their compact, which had been suggested by prudence and was backed by fraternity, there were submitted to arms differences, the origin of which did not, by any means, affect the honor of either nation. Neither the calamities of a war, the end of which has become the hope of humanity, nor the good offices tendered by European and American governments, nor the interposition of an impartial power that is respected the world over, have succeeded in inclining the belligerents toward the arbitration agreed to in their compact, and the war which goes on with the destructions of those nations demonstrate the fact that the principle incorporated in the recent convention of Colombia is not a sufficient guarantee for the maintenance of peace.

It is, therefore, necessary that it be accompanied by others which are not less important; and if the congress of plenipotentiaries which the Government of Colombia desires is to be called, it must have power to sanction all the statements and resolutions which are likely to aid the insuring of continental harmony. The old Spanish colonies having been made into free and sovereign nations, they proclaimed as a base of their public right, the independence of each one themselves and the integrity of territory they occupied, or of that one which a few of them established themselves with the common consent of governments and peoples. These principles were the indissoluble bases of American integrity. They were born of an identity of interests and of hopes. They were strengthened by the efforts of an epoch of sacrifices and of virtues, and since 1824 they have had an influence in the diplomatic claims of the independent republics. They must be inscribed upon the first page of the projected conference, because they have the assent of the people, and they must be regarded as heirlooms of our emancipation. It is necessary to establish clearly the unauthorized nature of all attempts at violent annexation or of conquests, such as might raise permanent obstacles in the way of future stability. Segregations obtained by the force of arms have been in Europe the occasion of deeply rooted rivalries and resentments, and they would be in America a senseless aggression against the fraternity of nations which are united by nature and by history. "Violent annexation," said Lord Russell, in 1859, to the English ambassador to Paris, "may not be palliated by the causes which are usually alleged, for if might and not right were the determining power in the possession of territory the integrity and independence of all secondary states would be in continual danger." It is also necessary to guard against seditious segregation, which, though never experienced by this republic, has been attempted elsewhere, at the instigation of turbulent ambition some government.

Some governments have provided in their compacts stipulations to cover such eventualities, and among the tutelar dictrines of general order that is received which forbids arbitrary separations on the grounds that all acts of that nature require the consent of the state in which they are effected. The division of Colombia into three different republics was sanctioned by the will of that nation. The provinces of Potosi, Chuquisaca, Cochahamba, and La Paz, belonging to this republic, went in 1825 to form a part of the new state of Bolivia. According to an act of the Argentine Congress, the rich alienations which the Estado Oriental and Paraguay formed were authorized by the national will. The Argentine Government believes that this principle must be maintained by explicit resolutions. It was maintained by the United States of North America in its memorable struggle against the seditious theories of nullification, and it remembers in favor of Colombia the sympathetic declaration made by the liberator, to the effect that "the separation of any people or province without the consent of the political association to which it belongs, to be of the nature of anarchy." The Argentine Government is of the opinion, moreover, that it would be well clearly to establish in the international resolutions to be adopted, the fact that there does not exist in Spanish America any territory which may be regarded as res millus, and that all it contains, however deserted or far off they may be, belong to the old Spanish provinces, which were invested after 1810 with the rank of free and sovereign states.

On reaching this point, the undersigned must make a few brief remarks on the subject of the lands which remain uninhabited, for in the event of the admission of any different pretensions, founded upon that fact, the tranquillity sought by Colombia would exist no longer. The American republics, being the owners of the broad lands embraced by the colonial demarkations, and the system of colonization having been recently begun by them as a means of rapidly increasing their population and fertilizing the deserts, they cannot admit that the circumstance of there being large tracts of uninhabited land is a reason why their right of possession should be called in question.

If lack of population were to be admitted as a reason for making away with the property of others; if the possibility of occupying places that are at present unoccupied might be urged as a legitimate reason for taking possession of them, disquiet would reign in the councils of the nations that have been designed by Providence to develop in the midst of confidence and universal cordiality. His Excellency the President does not accept any vacillations in this regard, and he believes that the efforts and aspirations of every government should unite to raise the truth of history and justice as the sole origin of territorial dominion in this part of the world. The Argentine Government believes it to be an easy matter to prevent, through prudent and timely stipulations, the possibility of claims for damages or other pecuniary indemnities being converted into motives for the setting aside of arbitration, and it believes that any resolutions tending to insure the impossibility of hostilities ever breaking out among the states of South America without due notice for conciliation would be received with joy by every one. The first of these suggestions is conformable with the liberal mind of these nations, and the second will permit the governments to encourage the advancement of the states over which they preside, without investing what they need for their peaceable development in elements of precaution or of defense. It is not impossible that notwithstanding the assent of the governments to the principle of arbitration, and that they may grant to the ideas held forth in this note, there may arise questions that shall break, as has been done on the Pacific, the good understanding between two or more nations, and it belongs to the conciliating programme recommended by Colombia to fix rules for the mitigation of the consequences of such a calamity.

If America unites for the purpose of hindering armed conflicts, it is natural that she should endeavor, in the event of any taking place in spite of the common effort against them, to insure that they be not marked by that devastation which accompanied the wars of olden times. The undersigned might dwell upon the patriotic purposes expressed in the note of invitation to which he replies, but that he deems it prudent to limit his observations more directly to what may contribute to consolidate general tranquillity, leaving it to the governments to touch upon further considerations which are surely worthy of being brought before the international congress.

The undersigned does not claim to have presented any new ideas to the consideration of the Government of Colombia, and he has no hesitation in saying that some of those brought forward already have been accepted by the nations, whilst the others are commenced by the vote of the men who excelled in the great events of the revolution.

His excellency Señor Santa Maria will argue from the foregoing that the Argentine Government does not consider the sole stipulation of arbitration as an efficacious means of eliminating international discords. That in its opinion we might only arrive at such a result by incorporating with American public law the principles that are here recorded, and others of a like nature, that banishing fruitless differences may be now and in the future the surest guarantees of peace.

His Excellency the President of the Republic has charged the undersigned to submit to the Government of Colombia the above remarks, returning thanks for its courteous invitation, and to express the hope that they may be accepted, with the assurance that the necessary means will be adopted for the republic to be represented at a conference having more far-reaching objects than those proposed. His excellency considers that this one, being limited to the subscription of the convention recently celebrated at Bogotá, would be to respond but feebly to the elevated views of Colombia, and would leave unprovided for many requirements and aspirations that are worthy of attention. His Excellency the President has also charged the undersigned not to end this communication without renewing his assurances that the Argentine Government, ever faithful to its antecedents, will contribute, by all the means in its power, to prevent those hapless wars that destroy the links of a glorious union.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to assure his excellency the minister of foreign affairs of his highest and most distinguished consideration.

BERNARDO DE IRIGOYEN.

His excellency the minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Colombia, Don EUSTAQUIO SANTA MARIA.

No. 3.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Osborn.

No. 144.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 13, 1881.

SIR: I have read with deep interest the report you made to this Department in your No. 317, of the 4th of April last, touching the efforts of yourself and your colleague at Santiago de Chili to lessen the strain which exists between the Argentine Republic and Chili in the matter of the Patagonian boundary dispute, and to bring about the peaceful and final arbitrament of the question.

I need not, at this late day, in view of the consistent attitude of the United States in favor of international arbitration as a means of averting unfriendliness, or the deplorable horrors of warfare between nations, express the gladness with which this government would do any and every thing in its power to aid in so fortunate a disposition of this long pending and dangerous issue. I am sure that the readiness of the United States to lend its good offices in this direction, on any honorable and practical basis, is already appreciated on both sides. You should, however, lose no fitting opportunity of impressing this benevolent disposition on the mind of the Government of the Argentine Republic. In doing so you should take especial care to create the trusting conviction on its part that the United States, whether as counseling peaceful arbitration or in the possible resort of being chosen as arbitrator, would approach the question with absolute impartiality, having no bias toward either phase of the contention, and no desire for aught save the ascertainment of the right and the manifestation of justice. You should also let it be distinctly seen that we do not seek the position of arbitrator, but if the offer were made, our duty to our sister republics of the distant South would forbid our declining it.

A similar instruction is this day written to Mr. Thomas A. Osborn at Santiago.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Mr. Osborn to Mr. Blaine.

No. 324.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, July 1, 1881. (Received August 19.)

SIR: Referring to my dispatch, No. 317, in relation to my correspondence with my colleague, Mr. Thomas A. Osborn, our minister to Chili, with reference to the settlement of the boundary question between Chili and the Argentine Republic, I have the honor to state that my letter to Mr. Osborn, under date of January 4, in reply to his of November 15, 1880, up to date of April 10, 1881, remained unanswered and unacknowledged, and fearing that my letter might have miscarried, on that date, April 10, 1881, I directed to him a copy of the same, accompanied by the following note:

BUENOS AYRES, April 10.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: On the 4th of January last I addressed you a letter in reply to yours of November 15, 1880, in relation to the question of limits between Chili and the Argentine Republic. I also addressed you a note on the 5th instant, which will be handed you by a Mr. Hansen, if he succeeds in getting across the mountains.

In that note I suggested that as this government has no legation at Santiago, and Chili none here, and as the two governments have no direct official communication with each other, we might, by our good offices, bring them to a good understanding and effect a peaceful settlement of the question.

I am inclined to think that this government would be willing to give me—privately—a line which it would accept, without war or arbitration, as the boundary line between the two countries, if Chili will consent to give you a line on the same conditions, and if there be any difference between them, then this government would be willing that we should take the matter of difference up, and at least make the attempt to bring about a settlement of the long-pending question.

Of course, I have no authority to make this suggestion, still I am satisfied the arrangement can be made if Chili will consent. I am also satisfied that if they will submit the differences to us we can keep them from war, into which they will drift sooner or later, by settling the matter with little or no delay.

Please give me your views on the matter suggested, at your earliest convenience.

I am, governor, yours, &c.,

THOS. O. OSBORN.

To this note, in answer, I received telegram No. 1, a copy of which, with others, for your information, I have the honor herewith to inclose.*

On the reception of the telegram, I had an interview with the minister of foreign affairs, Dr. Irigoyen, and submitted to him the same, with the contents of my personal note to Mr. Osborn, on which the telegram was based.

The minister at once thanked me for my good office, and informed me that as soon as possible he would furnish me with a memorandum as to the line his government would accept, the contents of which is incorporated in telegram No. 2, and at the same time tendered me the free use of the national telegraph wire to Chili.

In accepting the wire, I assured the minister that I would take no step that would commit him or his government, or send any dispatch without consultation with him or without his approval, and at the same time informed him that at the conclusion of the negotiations, if it be failure or success, I should lay before my government all that I had done in the matter, and it would become a matter of record, and doubtless my colleague would do the same.

To this the minister readily assented, expressing his willingness to proceed, and said that he and his government were animated with the spirit of peace, did not want war, and were willing to use all honorable means to terminate the long pending question.

In the many, I might say, almost daily interviews with Minister Irigoyen, during the discussion, I always found him kind and courteous, clear and clever, master of the subject in all respects, and especially in relation to dates and documents in the long past, and always full of the determination to put an end, if possible, to the vexed question which has so often threatened the peace between the two republics.

The whole correspondence or negotiations were carried on by wire, and about the 1st of June a basis of settlement was substantially arrived at, and June 3 and June 6, respectively, the ministers of foreign affairs for Chili and the Argentine Republic made it official.

The boundary line adopted is a definite one, and nothing is left for arbitration, or to disturb the friendly relations of the two countries.

The boundary is from north to south, up to parallel 52° latitude, the cordillera of the Andes. The frontier line will run in that direction along the highest peaks of said cordillera as may divide the waters, and will pass between the springs that course down either side.

In the southern part of the continent, and to the north of the straits, the boundary will be a line starting from Point Dungeness, will be continued overland up to Mount Dinero, thence will proceed westward, following the highest elevation of the chain of hills, until reaching Mount Aymond.

From this point the line will be continued to the intersection of meridian 70° with parallel 52° latitude, and thence westward, coinciding with this last parallel, to the watershed of the Andes.

The territory to the north of this line, Argentine; to the south, Chilian.

In Tierra del Fuego a line will be drawn, starting from the point called Cape Espiritu Santo, latitude 52° 40′, continuing towards the south, coinciding with the western meridian of Greenwich 68° 24′, until it should strike Beagle Channel.

On the east side of this line will be Argentine, and the west side Chilian.

The islands of Los Estados, the remaining small islands there may be in the immediate vicinity thereto on the Atlantic, to the east of Tierra del Fuego, and eastern coast of Patagonia will belong to the Argentine Republic, and all the islands to the south of Beagle Channel up to Cape Horn, and such as there may be to the west of Tierra del Fuego, will belong to Chili.

The waters of the straits are neutralized forever and its free navigation insured to the flags of all nations, and it will be forbidden to raise on either of its coasts fortifications or military establishments.

After the settlement of the starting point on the straits—Point Dungeness—we met with the greatest obstacle in wording the fifth basis or article of the six bases.

The whole matter as to what was being done, or had been done, by way of settling the question, had been kept secret until one of the morning papers issued a bulletin, giving a dispatch from Chili, saying that the question was settled forever, which caused much excitement and rejoicing.

The arrangement appears to be acceptable to the press, the people, and all parties. Gold dropped, on receipt of the news, almost ten per cent., and is now only at a premium of about two per cent.

It is now understood that the treaty will be drawn up here, wired to Chili, and repeated back by wire, and that the Chilian consul here will be appointed minister plenipotentiary, for the time, to sign it with the minister of foreign affairs, Dr. Irigoyen, and it is proposed to submit it to the congresses of both republics on the same day, if possible, for approval.

SIR: The treaty of limits between the Argentine Republic and Chili was signed this, 3, p. m. by Dr. Irigoyen, minister of foreign affairs, and Mr. Echevarria, Chilian consul-general, who was constituted minister plenipotentiary ad hoc by telegraphic dispatch from his government.

Same delay was caused by failing to come to an agreement on the part of Chili in reference to the wording of basis or article fifth.

On the 20th instant I received a note from the minister of foreign affairs informing me that Mr. Echevarria had been instructed by his government to confirm arrangement arrived at, a copy of which, with a copy of my reply, I have the honor to inclose herewith.

The arrangement arrived at appears to be acceptable, at least no opposition, either by party or press, has as yet made its appearance.

THE CHILIAN TREATY.

Mr. Irigoyen to Mr. Osborn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Buenos Ayres, October 26, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that I am directed by the President of the Republic to forward you the annexed copy of the boundary treaty with Chili, signed on July 23 of this year.

The negotiations which have brought about the settlement were opened by the interposition of the worthy representatives of the Government of the United States accredited to this republic and to Chili. They were carried on in a spirit of moderation, and your excellency and your honorable colleague used every effort to smooth away difficulties and misunderstandings, and it is in part owing to this impartial interposition, born of the noble desire to re-establish the old good-will between two sister countries, that the settlement which renews and consolidates their traditional ties has been accomplished.

The Argentine and Chilian plenipotentiaries, on signing the boundary treaty, mentioned, in the protocol and the name of their respective governments, the high appreciation in which the latter held your excellency's noble endeavors and those of your colleague.

Public opinion has been spontaneous in similar manifestations, and I am directed by the President of the Republic to thank your excellency for the friendly offices that you have interposed in representation of the elevated policy of your country and of its enlightened government, and to congratulate you on the fact of your name being connected with an international act that guarantees cordiality and peace to two nations.

For my part, I shall ever remember with lively satisfaction this period of the official relations that it affords me so marked a pleasure to maintain with your excellency, and I beg to tender you my sincerest wishes for your happiness, and to renew to you the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor of remaining

Your excellency's obedient servant,

BERNARDO DE IRIGOYEN.

His Excellency General T. O. OSBORN, United States Minister Resident.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC AND CHILI.

In the name of Almighty God.

As the Governments of the Argentine Republic and of the Republic of Chili are desirous to settle in a friendly and becoming manner the existing dispute between the two countries as to boundaries, and in fulfillment of the thirty-ninth article of the treaty of April, 1856, they have resolved to draw up a boundary treaty, and to this end have appointed their plenipotentiaries, viz:

His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic, Don Bernardo de Irigoyen, secretary for foreign affairs; His Excellency the President of the Republic of Chili, Don Francisco de B. Echeverria, the consul general for said republic;

Who, after exhibiting their full powers and found them in due form for the purpose, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The boundary between the Argentine Republic and Chili is, from north to south, up to parallel 52° latitude the Cordillera of the Andes. The frontier line is to run in that direction over such of the highest peaks of said cordillera as may divide the waters, and is to cross the springs that start from both sides. Any difficulties that should arise on account of there being certain valleys that are formed by the bifurcation of the cordillera and wherein the divisional line of waters may not be clear, will be amicably settled by two experts, one to be named by each party. Should these experts not come to any understanding, a third one appointed by both governments, will be called upon to decide said difficulties. A record will be drawn up of the operations the experts may make, in duplicate copy, signed by both experts, as regards the points they may have agreed upon, and, besides, by the third expert as to the points he may settle. This record will carry full weight with it, once signed by them, and will be held to be good and valid without any necessity of other formalities or steps. A copy of the proceedings will be sent to each of the two governments.

ART. 2. In the southern part of the continent and to the north of the straits the boundary between the two countries will be a line, which, starting from Point Dungeness, will be continued overland up to Mount Dinero; thence it will proceed westwards, following the highest elevations of the chain of hillocks that exist there, until reaching Mount Aymont.

From this point the line will be continued up to the intersection of meridian 7 with parallel 52° latitude, and thence westward, coinciding with this last parallel to the watershed of the Andes.

The territories to the north of said line will belong to the Argentine Republic, and those to the south will belong to Chili, without this affecting what Article 3 determines as regards Tierra del Fuego and the adjacent islands.

ART. 3. In Tierra del Fuego a line will be drawn, which, starting from the point called Espiritu Santo, latitude 52° 40′, will continue southwards, coinciding with the western meridian of Greenwich 68° 34′, until it shall strike Beagle Channel. Tierra del Fuego, divided in this manner, will be Chilian on the western and Argentine on the eastern side.

As regards the islands, the islands of Los Estados, the remaining small islands there may be in the immediate neighborhood thereof on the Atlantic to the east of Tierra del Fuego and eastern coast of Patagonia, will belong to the Argentine Republic; and all the islands to the south of Beagle Channel up to Cape Horn and such as there may be to the west of Tierra del Fuego will belong to Chili.

ART. 4. The same experts referred to in article 1 will determine on the ground itself the lines indicated in the two preceding articles, and will proceed in the same manner as that determined on therein.

ART. 5. The Straits of Magellan are neutralized, and free navigation thereon insured to the flags of all nations. With a view to guaranteeing this freedom and neutrality, no fortifications nor military defenses will be raised that may clash with that object.

ART. 6. The governments of the Argentine Repbulic and of Chili will exert full dominion ever after over the territories that respectively belong to them by virtue of the present agreement. Any question that should unfortunately arise between the two countries, whether it be in connection with this compromise or owing to any other cause, will be submitted to the decision of some friendly power, the boundary line, whatever the issue, such as is fixed by the present arrangement to be the unalterable one between the two republics.

ART. 7. The ratifications of this treaty will be exchanged within 70 days, or before, if possible, and the exchange will take place in the city of Buenos Ayres or in Santiago, Chili.

In witness whereof the plenipotentiaries of the Argentine Republic and of the Chilian Republic sealed, with their respective seals, and signed in duplicate the present treaty in the city of Buenos Ayres on the 23d of July, in the year of our Lord, 1881.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, October 26.

Mr. MINISTER: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt at this moment of a copy of the boundary treaty, signed by the two Republics on the 23d of July of the present year, accompanied by a note from your excellency of the present date.

Permit me to thank your excellency for presenting this legation the first authenticated copy at the disposal of your excellency, and, at the same time, I beg you will excuse a reply to your excellency's so personal and complimentary note.

Had my colleague at Santiago and I done less than tender our good offices when peace and the good-will of two sister republics were involved, we should have failed to represent that interest which our government has and will always have in the peace and prosperity of her sister republics of South America. I am glad to know that the treaty is an accomplished fact, and in the name of my government I congratulate your excellency, His Excellency the President, and the two republics, and desire to assure your excellency that if our government, by friendly intervention through its representatives, contributed in the least to the happy conclusion of negotiations, it, with its representatives, will find their reward in the hope and desire that the treaty which at this hour links the two republics in the bonds of peace and friendship may be as durable as the wire which was so faithful in the good work, and as lasting as the two republics. And may they live forever.

I cannot conclude this note nor take my leave of your excellency, or of His Excellency the President, in this very important matter in which others besides the two republics and their peoples were deeply interested, without referring to the days and nights of your patriotic labors and anxious thoughts for one whole year in order to preserve the boon of peace to your noble country, and which has connected you and his excellency your chief, the President, with glory.

I have no fitting words with which to express to your excellency my appreciation of the invariable kindness with which your excellency and His Excellency the President received me into your confidence and counsels, and be assured that I shall ever look with pride upon the fact that my name has been connected with the crowning work of your life and the glory of President Roca's administration.

Your excellency will please to accept my sincere wishes that you may be long preserved to your country and enjoy the renown which you have so successfully achieved.

I remain, Mr. Minister, &c.,

THOMAS O. OSBORN.

His Excellency Dr. DON BERNARDO DE IRIGOYEN, Minister for Foreign Affairs.

No. 9.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Osborn.

No. 156.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 29, 1881.

SIR: The attitude of the United States with respect to the question of general peace on the American continent is well known through its persistent efforts for years past to avert the evils of warfare, or, these efforts failing, to bring positive conflicts to an end through pacific counsels or the advocacy of impartial arbitration.

This attitude has been consistently maintained, and always with such fairness as to leave no room for imputing to our government any motive except the humane and disinterested one of saving the kindred states of the American continent from the burdens of war. The position of the United States as the leading power of the New World might well give to its government a claim to authoritative utterance for the purpose of quieting discord among its neighbors, with all of whom the most friendly relations exist. Nevertheless, the good offices of this government are not and have not at any time been tendered with a show of dictation or compulsion, but only as exhibiting the solicitous good-will of a common friend.

For some years past a growing disposition has been manifested by certain states of Central and South America to refer disputes affecting grave questions of international relationship and boundaries to arbitration rather than to the sword. It has been on several such occasions a source of profound satisfaction to the Government of the United States to see that this country is in a large measure looked to by all the American powers as their friend and mediator. The just and impartial counsel of the President in such cases has never been withheld, and his efforts have been rewarded by the prevention of sanguinary strife or angry contentions between peoples whom we regard as brethren.

The existence of this growing tendency convinces the President that the time is ripe for a proposal that shall enlist the good-will and active co-operation of all the states of the western hemisphere, both north and south, in the interest of humanity and for the common weal of nations. He conceives that none of the governments of America can be less alive than our own to the dangers and horrors of a state of war, and especially of war between kinsmen. He is sure that none of the chiefs of governments on the continent can be less sensitive than he is to the sacred duty of making every endeavor to do away with the chances of fratricidal strife. And he looks with hopeful confidence to such active assistance from them as will serve to show the broadness of our common humanity and the strength of the ties which bind us all together as a great and harmonious system of American commonwealths.

Impressed by these views, the President extends to all the independent countries of North and South America an earnest invitation to participate in a general congress to be held in the city of Washington on the 24th day of November, 1882, for the purpose of considering and discussing the methods of preventing war between the nations of America. He desires that the attention of the congress shall be strictly confined to this one great object; that its sole aim shall be to seek a way of permanently averting the horrors of cruel and bloody combat between countries, oftenest of one blood and speech, or the even worse calamity of internal commotion and civil strife; that it shall regard the burdensome and far-reaching consequences of such struggles, the legacies of exhausted finances, of oppressive debt, of onerous taxation, of ruined cities, of paralyzed industries, of devastated fields, of ruthless conscription, of the slaughter of men, of the grief of the widow and the orphan, of embittered resentments, that long survive those who provoked them and heavily afflict the innocent generations that come after.

The President is especially desirous to have it understood that, in putting forth this invitation, the United States does not assume the position of counseling, or attempting, through the voice of the congress, to counsel any determinate solution of existing questions which may now divide any of the countries of America. Such questions cannot properly come before the congress. Its mission is higher. It is to provide for the interests of all in the future, not to settle the individual differences of the present. For this reason especially the President has indicated a day for the assembling of the congress so far in the future as to leave good ground for hope that by the time named the present situation on the South Pacific coast will be happily terminated, and that those engaged in the contest may take peaceable part in the discussion and solution of the general question affecting in an equal degree the well-being of all.

It seems also desirable to disclaim in advance any purpose on the part of the United States to prejudge the issues to be presented to the congress. It is far from the intent of this government to appear before the congress as in any sense the protector of its neighbors or the predestined and necessary arbitrator of their disputes. The United States will enter into the deliberations of the congress on the same footing as the other powers represented, and with the loyal determination to approach any proposed solution, not merely in its own interest, or with a view to asserting its own power, but as a single member among many co-ordinate and coequal states. So far as the influence of this government may be potential, it will be exerted in the direction of conciliating whatever conflicting interests of blood, or government, or historical tradition may necessarily come together in response to a call embracing such vast and diverse elements.

You will present these views to the minister of foreign relations of the Argentine Republic, enlarging, if need be, in such terms as will readily occur to you, upon the great mission which it is within the power of the proposed congress to accomplish in the interest of humanity, and upon the firm purpose of the United States to maintain a position of the most absolute and impartial friendship towards all. You will thereupon, in the name of the President of the United States, tender to His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic, a formal invitation to send two commissioners to the congress, provided with such powers and instructions on behalf of their government as will enable them to consider the questions brought before that body within the limit of submission contemplated by this invitation. The United States, as well as the other powers, will, in like manner, be represented by two commissioners, so that equality and impartiality will be amply secured in the proceedings of the congress.

In delivering this invitation through the minister of foreign affairs, you will read this dispatch to him and leave with him a copy, intimating that an answer is desired by this government as promptly as the just consideration of so important a proposition will permit.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE LEGATION OF THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC AT WASHINGTON.

No. 10.

Mr. Carrié to Mr. Blaine.

[Translation.]

ARGENTINE LEGATION,
Washington, July 28, 1881. (Received July 29.)

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have this day received a telegram from Dr. Don Bernardo de Irigoyen, our minister of foreign relations, in which he informs me that a treaty has been signed with Chili, which puts an end to the long disputed boundary question, which had been under discussion for so many years, without the possibility of reaching a definitive arrangement. This happy result, Mr. Secretary of State, is due, according to the telegram aforesaid, to the unremitting efforts of the representatives of the United States in both countries, who, being actuated by the most hearty good-will, and taking a warm interest in the welfare and prosperity of those two sister republics, spared no pains to bring about an understanding between the two governments, and to smooth the obstacles which prevented the settlement of this vexed question, in return for which they have had the satisfaction of seeing their efforts crowned with complete success.

The only international question that we still had unsettled has been set at rest by the peaceful adjustment of this dispute, and the only cloud that threatened to disturb the tranquillity of the political horizon of the Argentine Republic has thereby been dispelled; the citizens of that republic may now devote their energies to profitable industry, with the certainty that they will not be disquieted by menaces either from within or without, rendering it necessary for them to take up arms in defense of their imperiled country.

As the representative, at this time, of the Government of the Argentine Republic in the United States, I deem it a high honor to inform your excellency of the grateful sentiments which are entertained by the Argentine people towards this great republic and its worthy representatives, who have just furnished palpable evidence of the feeling of genuine friendship which is cherished by the United States for the South American republics, and of their desire for the existence among those republics of the cordial relations which should ever exist among nations having a common origin.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 5, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 28th ultimo, conveying the gratifying intelligence of the signing of a treaty between the Argentine Republic and Chili, whereby the long-disputed boundary question is permanently settled. This government rejoices with its sister republics of the far south in so happy an event, and trusts that the harmonious relations now established between them may remain unbroken.

ARGENTINE LEGATION,
New York, November 28, 1881. (Received November 29.)

Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE: I have the honor herewith to inclose a communication which this legation has just received from the ministry of foreign relations of the Argentine Republic, addressed to your excellency, and which my government instructs me to transmit to you.

In so doing I take pleasure in reiterating to your excellency the assurance, &c.,

JULIO CARRIÉ.

Mr. Irigoyen to Mr. Blaine.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Buenos Ayres, October 27, 1881.

The undersigned minister secretary of state in the department of foreign relations, in obedience to the instructions of the President of the Republic, has the honor to address his excellency the Secretary of State of the Government of North America for the purpose of informing him of the kind co-operation which has been lent by General Thomas O. Osborn, the honorable representative of the Union in the settlement of the boundary question between this republic and that of Chili. After the negotiations had been initiated by the American ministers residing in both countries, the latter contributed largely towards keeping them under the influence of that moderation and kindly feeling which were necessary for the adjustment of differences of very long standing.

The Argentine Government which has observed the perseverance with which General Osborn worthily interpreting the friendly sentiments of his government has labored for the settlement of difficulties which were fraught with danger to the harmony between these republics, and when their traditional ties were reunited it signified to him, through the undersigned, its distinguished appreciation of the valuable services which he had so nobly lent.

The President has instructed the undersigned to address this communication to his excellency Mr. Blaine, not doubting that the Government of the United States will be pleased to learn that General Osborn, faithfully carrying out the American policy, has contributed to the successful termination of a negotiation which has re-established harmony and peace between two nations.

The undersigned offers, &c.,

BERNARDO DE IRIGOYEN.

ARGENTINE LEGATION,
New York, December 5, 1881. (Received December 7.)

Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE: I have the honor to inform your excellency, in obedience to instructions which I have just received from my government, that the treaty for the settlement of the boundary question which was concluded between the Argentine Republic and Chili, with the co-operation of the representatives of the United States in both republics, in the month of July last, as I had the pleasure to announce to you by my note written at the close of that month, has been ratified by both governments. Thus has an end been put to the long-pending question which for so many years has caused the relations between those two countries to lack warmth and cordiality, and which has at times been on the point of plunging them into the horrors and calamities of war.

By the adjustment just concluded, which does honor to both countries, the waters which might have become the scene of bloody hostilities between two nations bound by the ties of nature and history, are secured from the casualties of war and brought under the beneficent reign of tranquillity and peace.

As I know that your excellency has been thoroughly informed by the communications of the American legation at Buenos Ayres of the terms which serve as the basis of that treaty, I deem it unnecessary for me to state them in detail here.

But what I wish to do before concluding is to call your excellency's attention to the conciliatory spirit which has always guided the counsels and deliberations of the Argentine Government, and the efforts which it has made in behalf of peace between two sister republics, and of the great commercial interests of the same, during the long and complicated dispute which has now been happily terminated by the treaty which was concluded on the 23d of July last, with the co-operation of the worthy representatives of the United States in both countries.

No. 355.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, August 10, 1880. (Received August 30.)

SIR: The Imperial Royal ministry for foreign affairs has advised this legation that a certain Marcus Cohn has renounced his citizenship of the United States, acquired by naturalization, and has again become an Austrian subject.

I deem it proper to communicate this to the Department, and append hereto a copy of the note of the foreign office, with translation.

Count A. Volkenstein to Mr. Kasson.

The ministry for foreign affairs has the honor to inform the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. John A. Kasson, that according to a note of the imperial and royal Statthalterei in Prague, Marcus Cohn has renounced his citizenship of the United States of America, acquired by naturalization, and that in conformity with the treaty of 20th September, 1870, Austrian citizenship has been conferred on him.

At the same time, the undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the envoy the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

No. 377.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, October 26, 1880. (Received November 13.)

SIR: My attention has been called by the United States consul at Pesth to a law passed by the Hungarian Diet during the past year on the acquisition and loss of citizenship in that kingdom (especially to paragraph 48), and the possible liability of American citizens to the provisions of the same.

I have consulted Ritter Von Riedl, chief of the juridical section in the foreign office, as to whether the exceptions under treaties as stated in § 47 are not applicable to our citizens, native and naturalized, resident in Hungary. After an examination by him of the naturalization convention of September 20, 1870, he expressed an opinion in the affirmative, but recommended that a note should be addressed to the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the Hungarian Government on the question.

I herewith inclose a copy of the law, together with a translation, and respectfully ask the opinion and instructions of the Department.

I have, &c.,

J. F. DELAPLAINE.

Articles of the law of the year 1879 on the acquisition and loss of Hungarian citizenship.

(Sanctioned on the 20th December, 1879. Proclaimed in both Houses of the Diet on the 24th December, 1879.)

§ 1. In the collective provinces of the Hungarian Crown citizenship is one and the same.

§ 2. Hungarian citizenship is acquired only in the following manner:

1. Through descent.
2. Through legitimation.
3. Through marriage.
4. Through naturalization.

§ 3. Descent.—Through descent the legitimate children of an Hungarian citizen and the illegitimate children of an Hungarian female citizen acquire Hungarian citizenship in both cases even when the place of birth is in a foreign country.

§ 4. Legitimation.—Through legitimation the illegitimate children of an Hungarian citizen who are the offspring of a foreign female acquire Hungarian citizenship.

§ 5. Marriage.—Through marriage each foreign female who marries an Hungarian citizen acquires Hungarian citizenship.

§ 6. Naturalization.—Through naturalization each foreigner who receives a certificate of naturalization from one of the authorities named in § 11, or receives a diploma of naturalization from His Majesty, in compliance with § 17, and takes the oath or vow of Hungarian citizen, acquires Hungarian citizenship.

§ 7. The Hungarian citizenship acquired by a man received into the state-union extends to his wife and to the minor children being under his paternal authority.

§ 8. As to the acquisition of the Hungarian citizenship through naturalization that foreigner only can obtain a certificate of naturalization who (1) possesses the capability for the performance of correct actions, or when the consent of his lawful representative replaces the deficiency in this respect; (2) is received in the union of any native community, or whose reception by the community is in view; (3) lives uninterruptedly since five years in the country; (4) is of irreproachable previous life; (5) possesses so much property or such a source of income as enables him to support himself and his family according to the circumstances of his place of residence; (6) has been received for five years past in the list of tax-payers.

By the naturalization of a foreigner whom an Hungarian citizen has adopted in accordance with our laws the conditions of the points 3, 5, 6 of this paragraph can be remitted when the adopted party fulfills the conditions of §§ 5 and 6.

§ 9. For conferring Hungarian citizenship a properly-composed petition is to be addressed to the first officer (vicegespan Burgomaster) of that municipality, or at the military frontier, to that district bureau, or to that town magistrate in whose jurisdiction or district the petitioner resides.

§ 10. The authority indicated in § 9 examines the petition, with the accompanying papers, eventually directs the petitioner to supply the necessary documents which may be wanting, and in case where any suspicion arises as to the form or contents of these documents he requests from the competent authorities explanation, and submits the whole documents, accompanied by a developed opinion, to the ministry of the interior, or to the Croatian-Slavonic-Dalmatian Banus, or to the provincial authority of the military frontier.

§ 11. In the matter of the reception into the state-union, to be effected according to §§ 8, 9, and 10, the minister of the interior decides in regard to those who live in the territory of Hungary and Fiume; the Croatian-Slavonic-Dalmatian Banus, respectively; the military frontier, provincial authorities as regards those who live in the territory of Croatia-Slavonia, and in the event the petition be granted a certificate of naturalization will be delivered to the party. However, each separate case is to be brought to the knowledge of the minister president for the purpose of proof.

§ 12. In the certificate of naturalization shall be clearly expressed that the party has been received among the Hungarian citizens; and, in the case of § 7, also the names of the wife and of those children of the same to whom the naturalization extends shall be mentioned.

§ 13. After the certificate of naturalization has been submitted to the authority representing the affair, the same informs the authority indicated in § 9, which notifies the petitioner and fixes the day for taking the oath of citizen (vow).

The oath is to be taken before the first officer of the municipality; in the military frontier, before the chief of the district, respectively, before the burgomaster or his representative.

§ 14. The contents of the citizen-oath (vow) is as follows:

"I, N. N., swear (vow) by God, that I will be faithful to His Imperial and Royal Majesty the Apostolic King of Hungary and to the constitution of the provinces of the Hungarian Crown, and I promise that I will faithfully fulfill my duties as Hungarian citizen."

§ 15. A protocol is to be prepared in the matter of the taking of the oath (vow), that the taker of the oath (vow) is to subscribe; the day of the taking of the oath (vow) is to be indicated on the certificate of naturalization with the signature of him before whom the oath was taken, and this certificate is to be delivered to the party received into the state-union.

The party received into the state-union is, beginning from this day, Hungarian citizen, but can—the case provided in § 17 excepted—become a member of the legislature only after ten years subsequently for his reception into the state-union.

§ 16. When the party for whom the naturalization certificate has been issued, and who has been cited to take the oath (vow), does not appear and take the same within one year from the day of the citation, the naturalization certificate loses its validity, and is to be submitted to that authority which has issued it, together with evidence of the service of the citation.

§ 17. The ministry can propose to His Majesty the conferring of the right of citizenship on those foreigners who have performed extraordinary and distinguished meritorious services to the provinces of the Hungarian Crown, and either live in the country or declare that they will settle here, even when they do not possess the requirements enumerated in the points 2, 3, and 6 of the § 8.

When the party who has in such manner acquired the right of citizenship has not yet sought to be received in the union of a native community, then the community to which he belongs will be preliminarily Buda-Pest.

The enactments of the former §§ 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 are also applicable to those who have acquired citizenship with royal certificates.

§ 18. A foreigner does not acquire through naturalization Hungarian nobility.

§ 19. So long as their foreign nationality is not proved are to be considered as Hungarian citizens: (1) Those who are born in the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian Crown; (2) those who as foundlings have been found and educated or brought up in this territory.

§ 20. Of the loss of Hungarian citizenship.—Hungarian citizenship ceases: (1) Through discharge; (2) through decision of the authorities; (3) through absence; (4) through legitimation; (5) through marriage.

§ 20. Discharge.—As regards discharge, the decision depends, in time of peace, as to those who belong to the union of communities in the territory of Hungary and Fiume, from the minister of the interior, but as to those who belong to the union of the communities in the territory of Croatia-Slavonia, from the Banus of Croatia-Slavonia-Dalmatia, respectively, from the provincial administration of the military frontier.

In this decision, when approval is given to the petition, it shall be declared that the party is discharged from the union of the Hungarian state. Such decisions are for necessary proof to be submitted to the minister president.

§ 22. Individuals who stand under engagement to perform service in the line (marine), in the reserve, or substitute reserve, can be discharged from the union of the Hungarian state only in the case when they have received from the common minister of war of the monarchy (Honveds, however, only then when from the minister of defense of the country) a certificate of their discharge from the union of the militia.

Individuals who are not subject to the above-mentioned military duty, but are not definitely relieved from the same, can, in case they have already terminated their seventeen years, only be discharged from the union of the Hungarian state in the case that they exhibit through an attest of the respective jurisdiction that they do not apply for their discharge with the object of escaping military duty.

§ 23. Exceptions from the provisions contained in § 22 are on the ground of reciprocity in respect to those to whom the acquisition of Austrian citizenship is in view. These persons are to be discharged from the Hungarian state-union when they prove that they possess all the qualities enumerated in points 1, 2, and 3 of § 24.

§ 24. The discharge from the union of the Hungarian state can in time of peace not be denied for other reasons than those enumerated in § 22 to the party who proves (1) that he has capacity for correct action, or that his father, respectively his guardian or trustee, in the manner approved by guardian authorities, gives his consent to the application; (2) that he is not in arrears with any state or communal tax; (3) that he does not, within the territories of the provinces of the Hungarian crown, stand under criminal examination, or that a criminal sentence has been pronounced against him which has not been executed.

§ 25. In time of war His Majesty, on the proposal of the ministry, decidesin every separate case in regard to the discharge from the Hungarian state-union.

§ 26. The discharge extends to the wife of the discharged man, and so far as no exception exists in accordance with § 22 to the minor children being under paternal authority when they emigrate with the father, respectively parents.

§ 27. The properly-composed petition for discharge from the Hungarian state-union is to be delivered to the first officer (vicegespan, burgomaster) of that jurisdiction, respectively, in the military frontier, by that district bureau, in whose territory the petitioner belongs.

This authority observes in regard to the petition the proceedings enacted in § 10.

§ 28. In the decree of discharge it is to be clearly declared that the party is to be discharged from the union of the Hungarian state, and in the case provided in § 6 the names of the wife and those children of the discharged party are to be mentioned to whom the discharge extends.

§ 29. The decree of discharge brings, from the day of its presentation, the loss of Hungarian citizenship with it.

However, the discharge is invalid when the discharged party, before obtaining the decree of discharge up to the emigration, is involved in one of the obstacles included in the points 2 and 3 of § 24, or also besides, when the discharged party does not emigrate within one year after receiving the decree of his discharge.

§ 30. The authorities named in § 11 can pronounce the loss of citizenship in respect to such Hungarian citizens who belong to the communities in the territory standing under their administration, and who, without their permission, enter their service of another state; when these persons, after summons, do not leave this service within the appointed time.

The decisions mentioned in this § are, from time to time, for necessary proofs, to be submitted to the minister president.

§ 31. Absence.—The Hungarian citizen who, without order of the Hungarian Government or of the Austro-Hungarian common ministers, resides uninterruptedly for ten years out of the boundaries of the territory of the Hungarian crown, loses hereby Hungarian citizenship. The time of absence is to be reckoned from that day on which the party left the boundary of the territory of the Hungarian crown without having announced his retention of Hungarian citizenship to the competent authority indicated in § 9, or when he departed with a passport, from the day on which the passport expires.

The continuance of absence is interrupted when the absent party announced to the mentioned competent authority the retention of his Hungarian citizenship or obtained a new passport, or receives a certificate of residence from some Austro-Hungarian consulate or is entered in the register of an Austro-Hungarian consular district.

§ 32. The loss of Hungarian citizenship occurring in this manner extends to the wife living together with her absent husband and to their minor children with him and being under paternal authority.

§ 33. Legitimation.—Those children lose Hungarian citizenship who are legitimated in accordance with the laws of the native country of their natural father of foreign nationality, excepting when they, through this legitimation have not acquired the citizenship of their father, and also after their legitimation lived in the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown.

§ 34. Marriage.—The female loses her Hungarian citizenship who marries a man that is not an Hungarian citizen.

§ 35. The native female does not lose her Hungarian citizenship, who, marrying an Hungarian citizen, becomes widow, is judicially divorced, or when their marriage is annulled.

§ 36. The Hungarian citizen, who is at the same time citizen of another state, is to be considered as an Hungarian citizen so long as he has not lost his Hungarian citizenship.

§ 37. Reacquisition of citizenship.—The female reacquires her citizenship, who has married a foreigner, when her marriage is declared by a competent tribunal to be invalid.

§ 38. Re-reception into the state-union.—To those persons who have lost Hungarian citizenship and apply for re-reception among Hungarian citizens, the foregoing enactments in relation to reception in the state-union are applicable, in so far as the following sections, exhibit no exception.

§ 39. Whoever has lost Hungarian citizenship through discharge or absence, and has not acquired another citizenship, can also again be received among Hungarian citizens when he has not returned to live in the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown.

In the latter case the party again received into the state-union recovers his former belonging to the community.

§ 40. Whoever has lost his Hungarian citizenship through discharge or absence, and has returned to the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown, is received into the union of any native community respectively, receives this reception in view, can by means of his petition again be received among Hungarian citizens.

§ 41. The female who through discharge, absence of her husband, or her marriage with a foreigner, has lost her Hungarian citizenship, can, when she has been judicially divorced from her husband, her marriage has been annulled, or when she becomes a widow and has been received in the union of a community in the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown, or this reception has been placed in view, be received on application again among Hungarian citizens.

§ 42. Whoever as minor has lost his Hungarian citizenship through the discharge or absence of his legitimate father, can, after the death of his father, or after he has attained his majority in accordance with the laws of his new fatherland, and after he in both cases received in the union of a community of the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown, respectively, this reception has been placed in view, be received among Hungarian citizens on the base of his application to which, when he is minor, the consent of his guardian is requisite.

§ 43. The petition for renewed reception in the state-union is in the cases of §§ 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, to be presented to the authority indicated in § 9, to whose territory that community belongs, in whose union the party is received, or respectively, this reception is placed in view.

§ 44. To the reacquisition of citizenship that provision of § 15 does not extend that the party can become a member of the legislature only after a lapse of ten years, excepting when Hungarian citizenship is acquired by naturalization, and ten years have not elapsed since acquisition of the same.

§ 45. Final enactments.—The municipalities, respectively, in the military frontier, the district bureaus, and the town magistrates, are obliged to keep separate registers in two copies each in regard to conferring of citizenship, and in regard to discharge from the state-union.

I. The titles of the registers to be kept in respect to grants of citizenship, are—

1. The current number on the first day of the beginning year.

2. Name, age, occupation of the party received in the state-union, respectively, again received.

3. The former fatherland and the community to which the party received belongs.

4. Name and age of the members of the family to whom the reception in the state-union extends.

5. Date and number of the documents in regard to the reception into the state-union.

6. Annotation, in which is to be indicated in regard to the parties again received in what manner they lost their former citizenship.

II. The register to be kept in regard to discharges is to be provided with similar titles, with the difference that in the 6th title it is to be made clear whereby the party discharged from the state-union has acquired Hungarian citizenship. A copy of these registers is to be submitted to the authority named in §§ 11 and 21.

§ 46. In addition to the normal dues to be paid for the conferring of the right of citizenship and emigration, no due or tax is to be paid for the reception among Hungarian citizens, and for the discharge from the Hungarian state-union.

§ 47. Exceptions from this law are admissible to those states with which treaties on this subject have been concluded, so far as such treaties contain provisions at variance with the present law.

§ 48. All laws and ordinances contradictory to the present law are abolished. Through the present law the right of citizenship of those persons is not affected who acquired the reception up to the coming in force of this law.

Those persons are also to be considered as Hungarian citizens who have lived in the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown up to the day of the coming in force of this law at least five years without interruption, even when in various places, and are received in a native community in the list of tax-payers, when they do not prove within one year, reckoned from the coming in force of this law, before that jurisdiction respectively in the military frontier, before that district bureau or town magistrate in whose territory, respectively, whose district their last place of residence is, that they have retained their foreign citizenship.

The ten years fixed for the time of absence in § 31, are in regard to those who before the coming in force of the present law departed from the territory of the provinces of the Hungarian crown, to be reckoned from the day of the coming in force of the present law.

§ 49. The special enactments in respect to the Croatian-Slavonic military frontier, and to the provincial authorities of the military frontier contained in the present law are only provisional, and their operation lasts only until the military frontier is united also in an administrative way with Croatia-Slavonia.

§ 50. The ministry, respectively, the minister of the interior, the Banus of Croatia-Slavonia-Delmatia, and the provincial authorities of the military frontier are charged with the execution of this law.

No. 16.

Mr. Delaplaine to Mr. Evarts.

No. 381.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, November 5, 1880. (Received November 29.)

SIR: In the Austrian delegation, on the 3d instant, the imperial and royal minister for foreign affairs, Baron Haymerle, elaborately defined the motives and course of the Oriental policy of Austria-Hungary. I had designed at first the transmission of a summary analysis only, but in consideration of its interest and importance, I have made a translation of the whole speech, which I herewith inclose.

I have, &c.,

J. F. DELAPLAINE.

[Inclosure in No. 381.—Translation.]

Speech of Baron Haymerle.

The temptation for the minister for foreign affairs not to speak upon so wide a sphere of policy as has been here touched certainly is very great, because so many questions are introduced for discussion that he must impose upon himself great caution in his expressions.

The initiative to this so interesting, and I must allow, for the minister for foreign affairs, exciting debate, has been taken by the delegate, Baron Hübner. His speech culminated in the wish declared to the government, that inasmuch as complications are to be feared, endeavors should be made for having a postponement of the Oriental question. I, like most European statesmen, am deeply penetrated with the conviction that it is in the interest of Europe and in the interest of the populations of the Balkan Peninsula to avoid complications and to refrain from all precipitation in the Oriental question. I need not first give the assurance that the government will use its endeavors as well generally to avoid complications as to remove all acuteness from those which may possibly occur. The means which Baron Hübner has indicated to us does not appear to me altogether adapted to attain this postponement of complications, inasmuch as he has at once commenced by dividing the European powers into two groups which he appeared to assume had diverging interests, and they certainly possess powerful resources at their command. Yes, if Europe should at once be divided into two such groups, then it would perhaps be difficult to avoid complications and certainly it would be still more difficult to divest them of their dangerous character. It is not my task to inquire how the several powers should be here qualified, and in what manner their policy should be indicated. I should be obliged otherwise to raise objections against much which has been here expressed on both sides. I can, however, only say that the aim of our policy, the aim of those powers which stand with us on one line, especially of one power, is directed to the object, not of splitting Europe, but of uniting it in a common programme of peace and of tranquillity. This endeavor may be successful, it may have to struggle against greater or less difficulties, but in every case there are some powers in Europe, and especially two, which engage in this programme, and which, as I believe, form a firm nucleus around which others will group. Even if that programme should consist in the postponement of the Oriental question, it is not to be exclusively in the hands of the government.

The purpose of the Oriental concert is not, as the illusion is entertained, that all difficulties will be overcome, but that the hope is cherished, in case the opposing opinions should be reconciled, that a peaceful solution may be produced without prejudice to the vital interest of one or the other party. When this programme shall be maintained then it will naturally result that nothing can happen that is not considered as absolutely correct by one or the other power. All the questions to-day touched upon do not first issue from the Berlin Congress. The Bulgarian question already cast its heavy shadow upon the Constantinople conference of 1877, with which the ambassadors of the powers were then occupied. Similarly, the Greek question does not date from to-day; it is to be traced back to the years of 1820 and further. Accordingly, to find means to bring them to a settlement at a fixed time, even the concert of the European powers will not unconditionally succeed in effecting that object.

I will further reply to some remarks of Baron Hübner, upon the Dulcigno question, as also of the reporter on the Albanian question and the Greek question. It may be true that the non-intervention policy is the correct one, and that the most cautious use of international exceptional rules is to be made there where national passions are antagonistic, but non-interference is only then an arcanum when one is sure that others also do not interfere. But when a power proclaims in advance the principle of non-intervention, without the other powers at the same time engaging themselves to material and moral non-intervention, then this power becomes in advance disarmed. So in regard to the question of Dulcigno, which, owing to its tedious phase of development, the powers were unable to bring to a definite solution. In regard to the right of Montenegro to enter into possession of the territorial limits allotted to it in the treaty of Berlin; finally, in regard to the further questions whether an executional accomplishment of this question in a determined course might be proper, there were offered various ways which our policy might follow. We could decline simply every proposition aiming at that end, even oppose ourselves to it, and thereby be held liable to engage to act for not fulfilling the treaty of Berlin; we could unconditionally assent; we could finally advise as to our own interest and so far limit the European action that every danger for our own interest, as well as for the general interest of peace, would be avoided. Now, it is requisite for us, in our own interest, to see this question regulated since it is not desirable for any state that, on its immediate frontier, the scene of a conflagration which, although not locally of much extent, might become so, should conceal within itself glowing sparks, and we could, secondly, not well permit that on the immediate frontier of our empire, foreign powers should act without our participating in such action in friendly or antagonistic manner.

The expenditure of material means, the possible compromise of our policy, present themselves by the non-employment of the above-indicated means as alike small; there can therefore be no question of sacrifices, of a submission of Austrian and of a substitution of foreign interest. Finally, we have also our individual interests in this question so far as they, through a really unimportant object, could be brought in sympathy, and maintained. In this way we have claimed the extension of the new coast of Dulcigno to be ceded to Montenegro, and the right of maritime and sanitary police, granted to us in the treaty of Berlin over the ceded territory of Antivari; which claim of ours was assented to by all the signatory powers of the treaty of Berlin. The question of Dulcigno is, unfortunately, not yet finally settled. I believe, however, that the solution of the same must soon occur if one may believe the repeated assurances of the Porte, and may infer that, in Constantinople at present, the impression exists that it is extremely important for the Porte to put an end to the situation in which it stands to disadvantage with the other powers.

As to the Greek question, the reproach has been uttered that we have gone too far, inasmuch as we have assented to the determined boundaries. I have, in another place acknowledged, and I here acknowledge it anew, that we consider the Greek element as an element, the endeavors of which are accompanied with our sympathy. It is an ancient element of culture, and whatever culture in the Balkan Peninsula has been saved, owes thanks to the endeavors of the Greek element. The reproof that we have consented to a fixed frontier, is not exactly correct, inasmuch as the treaty of Berlin had already, in principle, settled the boundaries. We have, however, not stated the determined line as a compulsory line, but to hold fast to the idea "mediation," a mediation to which we were engaged, after Greece, in accordance with the treaty of Berlin had called for it. A decided engagement to accomplish this decision exists no more than on any of the other enactments of the treaty of Berlin.

In respect to the strength of the Greek element, not only does the extension of the boundaries of those provinces, in which since the last twenty years it has been decidedly repressed, belong to our interests, but I consider it requisite for the government to employ suitable means in order that the significance of the Hellenic element should have its right position acknowledged on convenient occasions and without prejudice to our own interest. How far the Austrian Government will proceed in this matter will be a subject of mature reflection, since there are political objects for which one makes a certain expenditure of means, but for which one is determined not to bring further sacrifices, nor to have recourse to measures which might lead in their consequences to greater complications. Whilst I, in this respect must maintain reserve, I notice the point has also reference to the question which the honorable delegate Demel has repeatedly presented, namely in reference to the question as to the aims followed in the East by the Austro-Hungarian Government. He has indeed dispensed with a strict answer being given, but desired to see the respective explanations fully communicated, particularly to know the general formula laid down for the aims of our Grecian policy. Now I might perhaps define the formula to this effect; that we will endeaver to preserve the equilibrium between the populations of the Balkan Peninsula, as well as also the equilibrium of the influence of the European powers.

I have still some words in reply to that which the reporter Plener has said in regard to the Albanian question and with regard to the relations with the neighboring states.

First, as regards the neighboring states, I am deeply penetrated by the wish to maintain with them the most friendly relations. A state which follows no egotistical policy, which does not wish for an aggrandizement of its territory or the annexation of another nationality to its territory, can only observe a friendly policy towards its neighbors.

The Austro-Hungarian monarchy can do it for the greater reason, since it is a question of nationalities which have already become a part of our Fatherland, and must therefore be dear to us. I believe it is the best policy to maintain friendship with neighboring states and to labor for the development of mutual prosperity. But here, again, the character of the reciprocal relations, and thereby, the result do not depend on us. One may be determined to be a good neighbor, and in that respect, I can only give the assurance, that my endeavors are always directed to maintaining friendly relations with our neighbors. But should one of the latter not receive the proffered hand, should he fail to discover that all his interests recommend him to maintain similar friendly relations, and should he occupy an antagonistic position, then would Austria-Hungary be in the condition of making her national might palpably felt. This is no boasting self-estimation, but may prove a necessity at a particular moment. That we are friendly neighbors, and can find friendly neighborhood, is evidenced by the greatly improved relations for some years past with Roumania. Certainly I might address an appeal to public opinion and its organs in Austria-Hungary, not to magnify into great conflicts the occasional frictions of interest and divergences of opinion which may arise (and which perhaps, I admit it will not be treated by those little states with the proper calm with which they should be treated) and not to artificially destroy the friendly relations which we are disposed to maintain.

The delegate Dr. Von Plener has also thought of one more nationality, which lays very near his heart, that is the Albanian. Gentlemen, that which I have already said in regard to our relations with the neighboring states, partly refers also to these races, which, in consequence of the occupation of Bosnia and the Herzogovina, have become our neighbors, and from whose legitimate expansion no menace for us can be foreseen, and which we have every reason therefore to aid and to further in their development. But so accurate a judge and so sharp a discerner as Dr. Von Plener is, still I must say, that the word "Albanian nation" is an idea that is, only now, on the point of being realized.

I will here make no ethnographic "excursus," but until a few years ago the Albanians knew extraordinarily little about an Albanian national feeling; and when one goes back into their history it is found that Northern Albania, under a prince like Skander-Beg (later under another native prince) and Southern Albania (about the time of Ali-Pasha) endeavored to have closer communication with each other, in order to give expression to their feelings of independence of the Porte; but their perfect understanding was never attained, and even to-day, in point of fact, prominent antagonistic views exist. This nation was divided into races, just as Scotland in the twelfth century was divided into clans, which were at one moment foes, at another formed alliances. When even the antagonistic views usually were not so sharp as in other oriental countries, still the difference between Mussulmen and Catholics was much more pronounced than between Mussulmen and orthodox in the south of the country. Recently and the merit belongs to the Porte, the national sentiment has begun to arise in Albania, and as I apprehend, not to the disadvantage of the Porte; but first of all, it must unite itself with the Islam world, particularly with the Sultan. Another junction of the Oriental Mohamedan element I cannot foresee, and from my experiences, I must say, that we shall have a great deal of trouble to protect these oriental elements against the oppression of the Mussulmen. In respect to the regulation of the Montenegrin question the treaty of Berlin has, in fact, made certain encroachments on the Albanian provinces. To oppose these the Mussulman inhabitants in the first place have made resistance, after the conferences of April, so also did the Catholic races. Dulcigno itself, does not properly affect the Albanian question; the best evidence for that is, that the resistance did not proceed from Dulcigno, but exclusively from outside instigation.

Much has been said, and also the delegate Dr. Von Plener has spoken—of alliances, secret understandings, and the like. If one reads the newspapers of the last few months, he will not find two countries in Europe, which have not concluded alliances and again have separated from each other. As regards Austria-Hungary, in the policy of the last few years—and this I may claim as well for my predecessor as for myself—constancy in our political relations and in our political aims has been our characteristic. I will abstain from giving assurances on my side as to this point, since these might only result in weakening a stable action for our general policy under all circumstances. It only remains to me to reply to the interpellation of the delegate Professor Suess.

I believe that it is well known with what lively interest I anticipated the commencement of the works at the iron Gate; I believe that it is a national economical interest of Austria-Hungary of the highest importance. I believe that though we have assumed no engagement in a juridical sense, but a right, we are still morally bound towards Europe to open the finest water highway of the continent, and elevate the Danube to the importance which it may gain along wide districts and extents of country. The question is at present between both governments of the Emperor and King in course of negotiation, and as regards the influential agency of the ministry of foreign affairs, which consecrates the most lively protection to this question as a task transferred to us by the treaty of Berlin; nothing, therefore, will be omitted to promote the affair, and to bring it to an early accomplishment; the ministry for foreign affairs, in fact, will regard it as its task to protect in every way and to foster the economical interest of Austria-Hungary.

But here I should not pass in silence the fact, that many varying influential circles in our population connect excessive and unwholesome expectations with the action of the government. The government can open a way. But that people shall go through it it is not in their power to effect, and when we wish to follow in these economical interests, then pioneers of economical progress from among the people must go before. We enjoy advantage by reason of geographical position, and also from Bosnia and the Herzogovina being opened to us, as if we were in them, upon Austro-Hungarian soil. The railways will, it is hoped, be constructed; in every case the government will make the necessary endeavors in order that they may be constructed, and it will direct to this question the greatest attention. Also in other departments of industry and commerce we do not occupy less favorable footing than other nations. I do not believe that in any highly developed people, it was the action of the government which alone, or even chiefly, has produced the advancement of economical prosperity. I would remind you of the example of little Switzerland which, under unfavorable circumstances, has produced a vast commerce and industry, and representations even into the countries of Eastern Asia, which far surpass those of other nations. Switzerland has no navigable rivers, is surrounded by foreign custom-house territories; is a mountainous, poor country, and possesses no diplomatic representation abroad, and yet there are in China and Eastern Asia Swiss firms which dispute the rank with the greatest German and English houses.

Hereupon the preliminary estimates for the ministry of foreign affairs, presented for demands and for covering expenditures, according to the propositions of the committee, was in special debate adopted.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 377, of the 26th ultimo, inclosing a translation and a copy of the Hungarian law of 1879 on naturalization, has been received.

The view expressed to you by the chief of the judicial section of the foreign office as to the applicability of the exceptions of article 47 of that law to our citizens, native and naturalized, resident in Hungary, is believed to be the correct and true interpretation of that article; and inasmuch as this may be assumed as the proper construction of the article, it is not deemed advisable at present, and in the absence of an actual, practical question, to interrogate the imperial and royal government on that point. Your care and prudence in submitting the suggestion, however, is commendable.

No. 390.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, November 30, 1880. (Received December 23.)

SIR: Yesterday was observed not only in this capital, but throughout the Austrian Empire, as a festival in commemoration of the day, on which a century before, the truly great and illustrious monarch, Joseph II, ascended the throne of the Habsburgs.

An equestrian statue stands opposite the Imperial Library, and the pedestal bears the inscription: "Josepho II, Aug. qui saluti publicae vixit ,non diu sed totus," thus laconically and gracefully recalling to the passing citizen and stranger the name and merits of a prince whose lofty philanthropy, enlightened patriotism, restless energy in the cause of education and in reform of abuses and in promoting the culture and welfare of his subjects, have gained for him an honorable record in history, more lasting than that brazen monument now adorned with wreaths. This noble epithet associated with his name: "Schätzer der Menschheit," indicating the high esteem cherished by him for the whole human race, is well deserved, and truly manifested by his public and private acts of benevolence. In the former may be enumerated the founding of the General Hospital of Vienna, which is accounted even now the largest and best conducted in the world, by the edict of religious toleration, by the abolition of many feudal franchises of the nobility, by his opening to the citizens of Vienna the Prater, the Augarten, and other resorts to which, previously, only the privileged classes enjoyed admittance. In the suppression of numerous monasteries and convents originated the inimical feelings of the clerical party towards him which have not diminished during the last hundred years. This has been shown in the absolute refusal of the clergy to confer upon the commemoration their approval, or to lend their co-operation

The performance of the official part of the programme has been appointed for to-day, being the visit by the civil authorities of Vienna to his last resting place in the vault of the Capuchins. To-night a voluntary and almost general illumination of the city is anticipated.

The most interesting of the festivities has probably been the banquet or "commers" of the students of the university and high schools who are connected with the Greman-Austrian Reading Association. It was held in the great hall of the Musikverein, where at least 4,000 persons were assembled to do honor to the illustrious regenerator of the Austrian Empire.

In response to an invitation addressed to me by the committee, I proceeded to the hall. Through its extent long tables were spread, at which the students were seated, while the larger portion of the invited guests, including numerous ladies, occupied the boxes and galleries. On a raised dais fronting the chair of the president, Baron Camerlander, was the "ehrentisch" or table of honor, to which, upon my arrival, I was conducted, and at which were also seated the ex-ministers Baron von Hofmann and Ritter von Hasner, the rector of the university, Dr. Lorenz, the vice-burgomaster of Vienna, Dr. Schrank, the eminent author Nordmann, also all the prominent liberal members of Parliament; Dr. Sturm, Baron Max Rubeck, Plener, Dr. Herbst, &c.

The president welcomed from the chair each of the invited guests by name, and upon the acknowledgment by each in rising from his seat and saluting, the cheers of the assembly followed in turn.

In the spirited speeches of Ritter von Hasner, Dr. Kopp, Dr. Herbst, and others, as well as in those of several members of the committee, not only the name and deeds of the enlightened Emperor were eulogized, but also his liberal ideas and lofty aspirations were recited, amid bursts of acclamation.

Ritter von Hasner remarked that in rising to address the assembly in a moment of such enthusiasm for the immortal Emperor Joseph, three phases of his life and of his personal experience came vividly to his memory.

I was [he said] professor in two high schools of this empire, and that period was the happiest of my life. When I now feel as professor, while I speak as such, I speak also as a Josephiner, as an admirer of that man to whom freedom of thought and moral and intellectual culture of his people were the highest aim and task of his life. When I speak as ex-minister of instruction, I speak the first word and express the first sentiment of a Josephiner. When I speak as a member of the House of Peers, then I speak as one of that old guard, each member of which adopts the distinction and title of Josephiner, and is proud of the privilege of being called by that name.

If I may be permitted to refer especially to one act among the many which the glorious Emperor performed, I am happy to have noticed it extolled in the glowing, patriotic spirit which has pervaded the eloquent speeches to which we have listened—his energetic support of the idea of unity in this empire. The present situation demands that this idea should be most warmly cherished. Austrian unity alone is the soil on which the fruits of our application and industry can flourish. The true statesman must possess one virtue, one quality, namely, patience and confidence in the triumph of truth, and this I commend to you as the statesmen of the future. Await the ripening of that which has been sown.

After citation of an apt metaphor in illustration of his opinion, he concluded with a toast, "To the immortality of the spirit of freedom and of patriotism in the academic youth of this empire."

The eminent advocate, Dr. Joseph Kopp, said:

I crave permission to comment on the reproach made against the Emperor Joseph, that he was in his home policy too precipitate and too much in advance of his period. Where is the source of this so-styled error? It is in the enthusiasm for all that is good and noble; in the impulse and the ardent ambition to deliver his subjects from the night of ignorance and from the bonds of servitude. Such truly great and eventful acts are offspring of the brightest virtues, and they ever originate in enthusiasm; they ever result from rapid action following firm determination. He had a reign of but ten years, and he wisely and efficiently employed this brief period. Had he omitted to do so—had the time been spent in cautious reflection only as to opportunity or advisability—then he would have left behind him nothing but unexecuted plans and projects, the evidence of his will indeed, but not the results of his acts.

After commending the laudable ambition and passion for the ideal which animate youth, but often decline and depart after later experience and under difficulties, he urged upon them the value of the lesson to be derived and expressed in the motto, "Be practical."

The orator concluded by offering a toast to "The prosperity of the German youth of Austria—our future, our hope, the inheritors of our toils, the successors to our conflicts, and to enjoyment of the fruits of our victories."

The tone of all the speeches of the evening was similar to that of the two from which I have quoted the above brief extracts, thus proving that the spirit of progress, of order, of obedience to law, and of constitutional liberty is deeply rooted and warmly cherished by the people of this empire, while their loyal attachment and devotion to their sovereign have ever been conspicuous on every occasion where an appeal has been made.

No. 392.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, December 6, 1880. (Received December 27.)

SIR: I have received from the United States consul at Buda-Pesth a note inclosing clipping from the Pester Lloyd, published in that city, which I herewith append. It is a notification to British subjects resident in Hungary and the territories belonging thereto from Her Britannic Majesty's consul-general at Buda-Pesth, wherein is suggested the entry of their names in a register at his office, in order to avoid difficulties which might arise in establishing their nationality.

Mr. Sterne informed me that the Swiss consul had published a similar notice to his countrymen, and asked whether a like action on his part would be advisable.

Not having received a reply from the Department to my No. 377, on the subject of the law relative to Hungarian citizenship, and in view of the brief interval before the law in question would come into force, it appeared to me that a similar notification might be expedient and to the interest of American citizens in that country. Upon consultation with Consul-General Weaver on the subject, he expressed full concurrence with my opinion, and I accordingly communicated the same to Mr. Sterne, at Buda-Pesth.

I have, &c.,

NOTICE TO BRITISH SUBJECTS.

The undersigned, Her Britannic Majesty's consul-general for Hungary, desires to draw the attention of British subjects resident in Hungary and the territories belonging thereto to paragraph 48 of Law L of December 24, 1879, which prescribes that—

"Whosoever shall have resided in Hungary, or the territories belonging thereto, at the time the present law came into force, (namely, the 24th of December, 1879,) for a period of at least five consecutive years, although at different places, and whose name has been entered in the register of tax-payers in any parish within the said dominions, shall be deemed to be a Hungarian subject, unless he shall prove within one year from the date above referred to (the 24th of December, 1879) to the magistrate of the place in which he resides, that he has retained his foreign nationality."

Under these circumstances, and in order to obviate difficulties which might arise to subjects of Her Britannic Majesty in establishing their nationality, the undersigned suggests the advisability of British subjects resident in Hungary having their names entered in a register kept for that purpose at Her Britannic Majesty's consulate-general at Buda-Pesth.

No. 400.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, December 24, 1880. (Received January 18, 1881.)

SIR: The questions arising under our laws of naturalization appear in endless variety, particularly in their application to children born before or after the naturalization of the parents, whether born in America or in foreign countries, and residing abroad after the return of their parents either to their original or other foreign country.

Another frequently recurring question relates to the action of a naturalized citizen in leaving the United States, returning to his original country and there residing, without any intention to ever return to the United States, and without actually resuming his former allegiance.

I beg to submit the points of three cases recently presented to this legation, and upon which I have been obliged to act:

I.—THE CASE OF GUSTAV SCHWETZER.

This applicant stated his case as follows:

Native of Austria; migrated to the United States 1851; naturalized in New Jersey in 1856; returned to Europe August, 1859, with a passport signed by Lewis Cass, dated August 10, 1859, and has ever since resided in Austria, and has no intention of returning to the United States.

To my inquiry if he had conducted business or had property in the United States, he answered that he "had never conducted business or had possessed property there." He is here married and has three children, born in Austria.

Thereupon I notified him that this legation entertained so serious a doubt respecting the continuance of his American citizenship that it would await instructions from the government before affirming it.

II.—THE CASE OF ANTON WURGLETS AND FAMILY.

Wurglets emigrated from Hungary in 1851, with the Kossuth emigration, to the United States; became a citizen August 6, 1856, in New York; lived sixteen years in America, working at his trade of shoemaker, and had children born there; after proclamation of amnesty in 1867 returned to Europe, and since 1869 has lived as a farmer in Hungary. His son Attila, born in New York in 1862, wishes to return there soon to live. All his children wish to return there, "to their native land."

I directed in this case that passports should be granted, and regarded the United States citizenship of the family as continuing, though the father does not appear to intend personally to return to America.

III.—THE CASES OF HENRY HUBER AND FAMILY AND FREDERICK HUBER AND FAMILY, arrested through the consulate at Prague, are as follows:

The father born in Switzerland in 1823; married there in 1846; his five eldest children also born there; emigrated with his family to the United States in 1854; naturalized in Ohio December 31, 1859; returned with his family to Europe May, 1860; one daughter, Fredericka, born in the United States April, 1858; his next daughter born in Bohemia (where the family then lived) in 1862; his eldest son, Heinrich, returned to the United States in 1864, and still lives there. His son Frederick married an Austrian subject in Austria, in 1876, and has one child born here. The son Frederick "intends," at some time hereafter, "to return to America." The father's "return is not distant."

All the children were minors at the time of arriving in, and departing from, the United States, and the family is included in the passport issued by Lewis Cass in 1860.

He applies for renewal of this old passport, and for an original passport for the son Frederick above named.

My difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory decision in these cases arises from the language of our statute. Section 2167 seems to contemplate the case of minors emigrating without their parents, but may include other minors. Section 2172 intends minors living with their parents at the time of naturalization, but employs as to these the dubious expression "shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof." Does that mean that our laws make them citizens by virtue of the father's naturalization while they are minors living with him? or does it mean that the law considers them to be citizens only during their residence in the United States and withholds protection from them outside of the domestic jurisdiction? or that they are not to be considered our citizens at all, anywhere beyond their minority? Are they thrown back on arriving in Europe upon their born allegiance?

These cases bring up all these questions.

I have decided to grant the passport upon the facts alleged to Henry Huber, accompanied by his wife and minor children, and (with greater reluctance) to Frederick Huber, accompanied by his wife and infant child. Had they been living in the country of their birth, I should have declined it.

Calling the attention of the Secretary to the uncertainty of the law, and to my action thereunder,

As I have formerly advised you, in addition to the members of the Skuptchina elected by the people, the government itself appoints forty members. It is now stated that the Prince has just signed the decree, naming this list, which instead of embracing, as formerly, government officials only, now contains the names of persons of the various professions of the country, and includes one Hebrew of Belgrade, and one Turk of Nisch.

The notification, a copy of which accompanies his dispatch, and which, as he states, has been suggested by Mr. Sterne, consul of the United States at Buda-Pesth, appears to be a timely precaution calculated to subserve the convenience of citizens of the United States residing or sojourning in Hungary; and although, in view of the provisions of the Hungarian law referred to, the observance of such a formality may not be indispensable to the security and enjoyment of their treaty rights, it furnishes the most convenient mode of making the status and intentions of the parties public, and is therefore approved.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, December 31, 1880.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, referring to the note from the foreign office (I, 1475–9), under date of August 4, 1880, announcing that one Marcus Cohn, had renounced his American citizenship, and assumed that of Austria, begs that his excellency Baron Haymerle, minister of the imperial house and imperial and royal minister for foreign affairs, will be so good as to cause the transmission to this legation, of a statement which will certify the place and time of this act of renunciation by the aforesaid Cohn, together with a copy of the record of the same showing the formal act of renunciation, certificate of which appears to be required for use in the United States.

The undersigned will also be glad to receive, for the information of the Department of State at Washington, a copy of the law, if any, under which such acts of renunciation are recorded.

He avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency Baron Haymerle, the assurance of his very distinguished consideration.

VIENNA, January 8, 1881.

In response to the esteemed note of the 31st December last, (F. O. 68,) the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs has the honor respectfully to transmit to Mr. J. A. Kasson, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, the inclosed protocol, taken with Marcus Cohn by the district captaincy in Bischof-Teinitz, on the 16th of July, 1880, whereby the said Cohn expressly renounced the citizenship of the United States of America, acquired through naturalization.

With regard to the information desired by the envoy at the close of his note, the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs, has the honor to remark that in respect to the renunciation provided in article IV of the convention of 20th September, 1870, by a citizen of the United States of America of his allegiance, no special legal enactments exist in this empire.

With regard to the renunciation of Austrian citizenship, the same is, article 4 of the Austrian state fundamental law of December 20, 1867 (A. G. L., No. 142), "on the part of the state, only limited by duty of military service," and accordingly, males no longer liable to such service and females do not require a formal document of discharge in order to be released from their allegiance. The delivery of a declaration to this effect before the competent political authority at first resort is sufficient, which authority, upon application, issues a certificate to that effect.

The undersigned, avails himself, &c.

For the ministry for foreign affairs.

WOLFARTH.

The Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. JOHN A. KASSON.

Protocol of Marcus Cohn, taken July 16, 1880, at Bischof-teinitz.

[50 Kreu'r stamp.]

Taken at the K. K. district captaincy, at Bischof-teinitz, on the 16th of July, 1880.

SUBJECT.

The Hon. K. K. Statthalterei, in Prague, has, under edict of July 5, 1880, (Z. 40985) based on the present application of Marcus Cohn for re-reception into relations with the Austrian state, ordered, that a document shall be required and produced from him wherein he expressly renounces the citizenship of the United States of America, acquired by him through naturalization.

Marcus Cohn to-day appeared here and begs, in pursuance of the edict of the before-mentioned Hon. Statthalterei, that protocol of the following declaration, be taken:

"I hereby expressly declare, that I renounce the citizenship of the United States of America, acquired by me through naturalization.

"MARCUS COHN."

JOSEPH MAYER, witness.
WILHELM WURSCHER, witness.

Concluded and executed.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Vienna, January 15, 1881.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, acknowledging the reception of the note from the imperial and royal ministry of foreign affairs (II, 66, 7), dated January 8, 1881, and returning thanks for the communication with its inclosure, herewith returns the declaration of renunciation of American citizenship made by Marcus Cohn, and begs to say that Mr. Evarts desired the information with a view to understand the customary forms adopted in such cases by the Austro-Hungarian Government.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew, &c.

No. 415.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, January 22, 1881. (Received February 5.)

SIR: Referring to legation numbers 392 and 400, and as bearing upon the general question of the rights of naturalized citizens who have resumed their residence in Europe, I beg to submit to the Department the correspondence between this legation and the consulate at Pest, copies of which are appended hereto.

I suppose the Hungarian law in question to be aimed at other and more numerous classes of their population than the American citizens who happen to reside there. Still, it is probable the question may soon be raised touching one who bears American papers, when, of course, the question can be more considerately discussed.

I have, &c.,

Mr. Sterne to Mr. Delaplaine.

No. 245.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Budapest, December 12, 1880.

DEAR SIR: I do not like to trouble you with frivolous questions and have therefore tried to avoid doing so in the present case, but my questioner insists on my obtaining your opinion upon his case, and I therefore herewith submit the same to you.

Mr. Adolph Klein, born here, but a citizen of the United States since 1863, returned to this city in 1865 and resided here again until 1874; from 1875 to 1878 resided again in Germany and America, but since then in Germany and Austria-Hungary, and now during the last nine months again as a fixed resident here in Budapest, but wishes to continue his United States citizenship. Klein wants to know whether he can be included among those by the Hungarian authorities, who, on account of a residence in this state of five years, should make a declaration, as per section 48 of the new Hungarian law relating to such foreign citizens and on which subject I have already written to you.

Though in my private opinion this new Hungarian law will not hold good, because it is not based upon mutuality and should be also approved of by the United States Government, yet I fear it will be the cause of a good deal of trouble to our citizens here and through them to us, from whom they will claim protection; and have published that card calling our citizens' attention to their case, but no doubt it will not reach all those interested, and since the officials here seem to be very fond of acting quite arbitrarily, some of our citizens will have trouble. I should therefore be glad to soon receive definite instructions from the Department concerning my duties in the new case.

Thus far I have pursued the following course: I issue to those United States citizens who require it a declaration like the inclosed copy, and hope my doing so does not conflict with my duties or privileges. Before I give my declaration the respective citizen of course has to satisfy me that he is a United States citizen, and for this purpose I accept only of a regular passport.

Please tell me whether naturalization papers alone would be sufficient evidence of citizenship in such cases; also whether the date of a passport will affect its validity, most passports being older than two years.

Since I have troubled you so much this time, I further beg to include another question upon a subject frequently submitted to me, but upon which my mind is not quite clear. It is as follows: Can a former Hungarian citizen, but now a United States citizen, be placed in the army upon his return here, if he emigrated after having been already notified to appear for "assentierung" (which means to present himself for physical inspection about his fitness to become a soldier), but who not being then found fit to serve is temporarily placed on the list for the following year, but in the mean time emigrated. I think such American citizen can upon his return be taken into the army, but I would thank you for your opinion and decision upon the subject. However, I may be wrong, because such men are not required to take the oath to the flag (farneueid) until they are physically found fit to serve.

I hope you will please excuse me for all this trouble to you, and remain, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

HENRY STERNE,
United States Consul.

Hon. J. F. DELAPLAINE,
United States Secretary of Legation, Vienna.

Mr. Kasson to Mr. Sterne.

AMERICAN LEGATION AT VIENNA,
December 15, 1880.

SIR: In answer to the inquiries of your note of the 12th instant, I have to say:

1st. The law of Hungary, it is well understood, cannot change the provisions of our treaty of September 20, 1870. Our naturalized citizens have on their return to Austria-Hungary all the rights guaranteed by the first and fourth articles of that treaty. The latter article shows that one can only become a citizen "of his own accord," and cannot be "constrained to resume his former citizenship." The law in question, if applied to former Austro-Hungarian subjects naturalized in the United States, and not "of their own accord" accepting the new citizenship, it seems clear, would be a constraint in violation of the treaty. My opinion is based upon the translation of the law published over the signature of the British consul-general. This law states that the residence is to be for "at feast five consecutive years" within the state of Hungary; and the name must also have "been entered in the register of tax-payers" in some parish. The fair construction of the law would be for the five consecutive years next preceding the time when they claim to apply the law to a foreign citizen.

But the construction which the Hungarian courts will give to it cannot, of course, be foreseen by this legation. If he was not between 1865 and 1874 "entered in the register of tax-payers," it would seem that Klein could not be affected till the lapse of five years from 1878, if at all.

2d. I see no objection to your delivering to each American citizen a certificate of the purport of that of which you transmit a copy in your letter of the 12th instant.

3d. Touching the evidence of citizenship upon which you would feel justified in acting, I have only to say that there are two classes of persons claiming to be citizens who have from time to time presented themselves to this legation. The one class is composed of either native or naturalized citizens who have had homes and business in America, and who evidently regard that country as their real home, and its government as the one to which their allegiance is due. For them a passport of whatever date or a final naturalization certificate (their identity being shown) would be enough to justify your proposed certificate. The other class is composed of those who appear only to have lived long enough in the United States to obtain their papers, and then returned to their original country, and there resided without the intention of returning to the United States to live. This class often is composed of people who have only obtained papers by which they hope to escape the obligations of allegiance to the country of their birth without assuming any toward the country in which they were naturalized, Our laws are not intended to aid such persons in their objects; and this legation has refused, in clear cases, to recognize them as lawful citizens of the United States. The only occasion when they actually claim to be such is when they seek to escape some duty of a subject, or demand charitable relief. It must be left to your good judgment to make the proper distinction.

4th. If the emigration of a man from whom military service is claimed occurred before he was "drafted at the time of conscription" (see article 2, convention with Austria of September 20, 1870), he cannot afterward be held to military punishment for such emigration, nor is he liable to army service while remaining bona fide an American citizen. The case you give does not appear to be such a case of drafting.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. KASSON.

United States Consul, Budapest.

SIR: Referring to my No. 401, I have now the honor to transmit herewith the concluding correspondence on the subject of a representative of the United States to reside at Belgrade, which appears to be earnestly desired by the government of that principality.

I venture to express the hope that my government will favorably appreciate the dignified but touching appeal involved in the contrast of the financial condition of the two countries, suggested in the last note of the Servian envoy, and will lend to that government the moral support of an American representative at its capital. Servia is struggling to establish its independence with the civilization of western Europe, under many difficulties arising from powerful intervening neighbors, and from the burdens imposed on it by the provisions of the Berlin Congress. It would seem to have a moral right to the generous consideration of the freer, richer, and more disinterested members of the family of nations.

ceived with the most sincere satisfaction the expression of the friendly sentiments entertained by the Servian Government, and of its desire to have at Belgrade a representative of the United States.

Mr. Evarts, the Secretary of State for foreign affairs, while awaiting a communication from the Servian Government relative to the rank of the representative which it might desire to send to the United States, will submit the proposition communicated to him to the consideration of the President and of Congress.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: I have just received the response of the minister for foreign affairs following the communication of the contents of the note which you were pleased to address to me on the 1st instant. The government sincerely regrets that the present condition of our finances does not allow it to nominate its representative near the United States of America; still, it indulges the hope that the great and wealthy Republic will not for that reason be less disposed to nominate its representative at Belgrade.

I avail myself, Monsieur le Ministre, of this fresh occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration.

No. 430.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, March 1, 1881. (Received March 17.)

SIR: * * * I called upon Baron Haymerle, when a conversation took place, a memorandum of which, on my part, he desired me to write out and leave with him, that he might send a copy to each of the governments of Austria and Hungary.

That memorandum was to-day sent to him, and is as follows:

FEBRUARY 28, 1881.

Mr. Kasson said that his government had been very much surprised by the sudden action of one or two European Governments in respect to the prohibition of American pork. As Baron Haymerle was aware, it was an important article of American commerce, and such unexpected action affecting its importation necessarily produced a serious effect upon the market. Thinking it possible that the same interests which had elsewhere induced action by a government might also be brought to bear in Austria and Hungary, Mr. Evarts had instructed him to see Baron Haymerle in person and explain to him the views of the American Government.

It was very easy to create alarm by false reports, and unfortunately there are in all countries, including the United States, two rival interests, one wishing to raise, the other to depress prices, and which sometimes use unscrupulous means to attain their object. In France, for example, where a family was reported to have been attacked by trichinosis from the use of American pork, it was ascertained on inquiry (after governmental action had produced its effect on the market) that the attack resulted from the use of French pork, not American. Undoubtedly, trichinæ may exist in the pork of any country in special cases. But it was less likely to exist in American pork than in European because the American pigs are generally fed and fattened on Indian corn (maize) a perfectly pure food; while the trichinæ are supposed to come from the use of unclean food, from eating unclean carcasses, as of rats, &c. In the pork-producing regions of the United States the conditions of the disease hardly exist, while they are often found in Europe. The United States first knew of the disease called trichinosis from hearing of its existence in Germany.

It would be a great injustice to exclude on suspicion American pork alone, when the suspicion should more strongly attach to all European pork. Indeed, it would be regarded as oppressive and intolerable. Naturally there can be no objection to the refusal of meat found to be diseased, from whatever country it should come. But exceptional rules of importation suddenly imposed on a great branch of trade, and without notice, are to be protested as contrary to the safe conduct of trade, and as tending to embarrass international relations and commerce.

In presence of the enormous consumption at home of American pork without injury to the consumer, and without fear, his government believes that no cause exists for an exceptional rule applicable to this American export, and cannot regard its exceptional treatment as due to legitimate sanitary considerations. It believes the Austro-Hungarian government will appreciate the equity of these views.

In the course of the conversation, when I alluded to the action of France, he said: "There is another country which has also taken action against the importation of your pork, is there not?" I answered that Germany had, I believe, done so; but only against a certain class of the pork, as I understood; but I had not seen the order myself, and could not speak positively. He also spoke of the fact, well-known, that the "protection" of home production was an element which undoubtedly influenced European action in this subject. He said nothing of the proposed action of the two governments of Austria and of Hungary, but proposed to communicate to them my memorandum. He received my representations in a very friendly manner, and gave no indication of any other than a friendly and just treatment of the subject.

SIR: I beg to advise the Department of the circumstances attending the arrest and expulsion from Austrian territory of one Jacob Erasmus, who claimed to be an American citizen, and so applied to this legation for protection, and of my intervention therein.

This intervention was promptly made, and developed the fact that he was arrested for recruiting emigrants for the United States, to be shipped by a particular line of steamers, and for a reward to be paid by the steamship company; that the statements of his telegram to me were of questionable veracity; the official report stating his business to be quite other than the "arrangement of his affairs," and that he himself emigrated only three years ago, in which case he could not now be an American citizen.

The official reports are of further value as indicating the laws and ordinances of this empire, applicable to efforts to induce emigration.

No further communication has been received from Erasmus. Copies of the correspondence are herewith inclosed for the full information of the Department.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Vienna, February 19, 1881.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, referring to the telegram from one Jacob Erasmus, claiming to be an American citizen, and addressed to this legation, and which was, on the 17th instant, informally submitted, through Monsieur de Kallay, to the ministry for foreign affairs for their examination and following inquiry, has now the honor to request that the telegram referred to may be returned to this legation when the same shall have been duly examined and a copy taken if desired. He will also be glad to be informed of the result of the inquiry into the truth of the complaint therein made that Erasmus, as an American citizen, was illegally arrested, and without cause deprived of the formal document attesting his nationality.

In response to the esteemed note of the 19th instant the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs has the honor to transmit with thanks to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. John A. Kasson, the accompanying telegram of Erasmus, placed at the disposition of the said ministry, referring to his detention at Pilzno, and to add the copy of a telegram which the imperial and royal statthalterei in Galicia, to whom telegraphic advice was forthwith sent, addressed to the ministry on the 19th instant, from which the envoy will perceive that proceedings have been instituted by the imperial and royal authorities against Erasmus, on account, as appears, of recruitings for America, in contravention of existing ordinances.

The imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs proposes, as soon as the particulars of the case shall have been communicated to it, as promised in the telegram, to bring them without delay to the knowledge of the envoy.

Meanwhile the undersigned avails himself, &c.

VIENNA, February 27, 1881.

In pursuance of the respectful note of the 20th instant (No. 3339–7), the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs now has the honor to communicate to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. Kasson, the particulars reported to the ministry by the imperial and royal statthalterei at Lemberg, relative to the seizure and arrest of the naturalized American citizen, Jacob Erasmus.

At the end of last month the gendarmery post command in Zassow ascertained that Jacob Erasmus, landlord from Roja district, Pilzno, who three years previously emigrated to America, had returned to his native place, and was occupied in the recruiting of his countrymen for removal to America.

On the basis of this notification Erasmus was arrested in his own house, which the imperial and royal gendarmery found formally besieged by people from the whole vicinity, and was, by the imperial and royal district captaincy in Pilzno, delivered to the imperial and royal district court of the same place for official penal action.

The correspondence found in Erasmus's possession exhibited evidence that he was charged by the attorney of the North German Lloyd, Carl Behmer, of Berlin, and by Carl Johan Klingenberg, ship agent of Bremen, to recruit in Galicia passengers for the voyage to America, for which service a compensation of 3 florins for each grown person and 1½ florins for each child was promised to him.

Inasmuch as Erasmus abode in Roja but a few days previous to his arrest, and, accordingly, by reason of the shortness of the time, could neither accomplish his mission nor cause any damage to the recruits, therefore the imperial and royal state prosecuting office in Tarno, to which the preliminary examination had by the imperial and royal district court of Pilzno been sent for the purpose of suggestion as to disposition of the case, found no tenable point for a further penal prosecution of Erasmus, and delivered the examination papers to the imperial and royal district captaincy in Pilzno, in the sense of the ministerial ordinance of September 30, 1857 (A. G. B. No. 198), for further official action in respect to the arrested party.

Hereupon Jacob Erasmus was condemned by the imperial and royal district captaincy in Pilzno, under sentence of the 17th instant, on account of unauthorized recruiting for America, based on the before-mentioned ministerial ordinance, to fourteen days' confinement; and, since he had, under a naturalization certificate of the American Union, given proof of his status, it was forthwith decreed that he, as a foreigner, in the sense of paragraph 2 of the imperial law of 27th July, 1871 (St. G. B. No. 88), under peril of the consequences stated in paragraph 323 of the penal law, should be expelled from all the crown lands of the Austrian monarchy.

Erasmus has entered no appeal against this judgment, and immediately submitted to the punishment.

The undersigned avails himself, &c.

No. 433.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, March 8, 1881. (Received March 25.)

SIR: The foreign office has voluntarily transmitted to this legation a further communication on the subject of renunciation of Austrian citizenship, indicating the present condition of the law. It further states that now emigration is only limited by the duty of military service.

I inclose herewith a copy of the original communication, and a translation of the same.

I have, &c.,

JOHN A. KASSON.

VIENNA, March 1, 1881.

With reference to the inquiry contained in the esteemed note of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. John A. Kasson, of the 15th ultimo, what customary forms may be observed in the case of renunciation of Austrian citizenship, the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs has the honor now to complete the communications contained in the note of the 8th ultimo. (No. II, 60, 7.)

According to section 32 (a. b. G. B.) the loss of citizenship is fixed through emigration or through marriage of a female citizen with a foreigner.

The emigration patent of March 24, 1832 (political law collection, vol. 60, page 73), is in many respects no longer applicable, in consequence of article 4, paragraph 3, of the fundamental state law of the 21st December, 1867, relative to the general rights of citizens.

The enactment of section 2 of the emigration patent, according to which every one who wishes to emigrate must apply to the provincial magistrate's office for his discharge from Austrian citizenship, has no longer special significance, inasmuch as the said article 4 contains the enactment that emigration is on the part of the state only limited by the duty of military service.

Hence, in the case of males not liable to military duty, and of females who wish to emigrate, an authorization thereto or a formal discharge from their connection with the Austrian Empire, is no longer required, and accordingly in the case of such persons an express renunciation of Austrian citizenship can only then become of practical use when the object is to obtain a formal consent to emigrate, notwithstanding the existing liberty of emigration, in order to prove the discharge from political connection with the empire, which is required in some countries for the purpose of being received into political connection with them.

Such a consent will then, upon each special application, be imparted by the political authorities of first resort of the place to which the party belongs, in the name of the provincial authorities; or, in places possessing there our statutes, when the affairs of the political authorities of first resort are managed by the commune, the consent is imparted by the provincial authorities themselves in the form of a certification that the emigrant in question has been discharged from political connection with the Austrian Empire.

Austrian citizens, subject to military duty, namely, those who (a) are in connection with the standing army, the recruit-reserve or militia (landwehr), or (b) being of the prescribed age for performance of military duty—that is, who can be drafted for the performance of proper war service or other service for war purposes—these citizens require, when they intend to withdraw from the Austrian political connection, a special permission to emigrate; that is, the formal discharge from connection with the army for the purpose of emigration; for the granting of which to persons, who stand under obligation to the standing army, the imperial and royal ministry of war for the empire is appointed, but for others the imperial and royal ministry for defense of the country is appointed according to the instructions for carrying out the existing enactments of the militia law of December 5, 1868 (R. G. bl. No. 151), and of the existing enactments relative to the militia men, on the basis of the law on the militia of the 13th May, 1869 R. G. bl. No. 68).

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the envoy the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

No. 434.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, March 12, 1881. (Received March 26.)

SIR: Recurring to the subject of my dispatches Nos. 428 and 430, I have now to add that on the 8th instant I received very opportunely your telegram of the following tenor:

Published statements of mortality among swine are false.

EVARTS.

I made it the occasion of a further communication to the minister for foreign affairs, as follows:

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Vienna, March 8, 1881.

DEAR BARON HAYMERLE: Referring to my conversation with you of the 28th ultimo, and to my note of the 1st instant inclosing "memorandum," I beg to call your attention to a telegram received to-day from the Secretary of State at Washington, which denies the reports put in circulation by interested parties respecting the prevalence of disease among American swine.

In this connection I beg that the attention of the proper authority in Austria and in Hungary may be called to the fact, as reported to this legation, that examinations have shown more condemnations of German and Servian swine meat on account of the presence of trichinæ than of American. A quantity of Westphalian hams are reported to have been recently confiscated in this city on that account. It is believed that when the reports made are duly considered by the respective governments, it will appear to them necessary to make one rule equally applicable to the importations from all countries.

Believe me, dear Baron Haymerle, your most obedient servant,

JOHN A. KASSON.

On the evening of the same day, meeting me in society, he said that he had received this note, and had already ordered its transmission to the Austrian and Hungarian Governments. Your telegram was opportune, especially because there had at the time appeared in the journals a statement that the municipality of Pest had just addressed to the government there a petition for the prohibition of the importation of lard, of pork, and of fat coming from America. By my advice the consul at Pest was instructed to remonstrate with the local authorities for reasons given, and his action thereon he afterwards reported to the consul-general.

I have now exhausted all the preventive means which occur to me as being in my power to reverse or modify the intended action of the two governments.

It has also been the subject of conversation between two of the ambassadors and myself, in which I sought to dissipate the groundless alarm, and indicated what is generally believed to be at the bottom of the difficulty, namely, the wish to obstruct and even abolish American competition in the home markets of Europe.

* * * * * * *

We are so far removed from the countries of interior Europe that their governments are not so careful in treating economic questions involving our interests alone as they are in dealing with like questions affecting their immediate neighbors. Their sense of international justice is also largely influenced by the widespread fear among their people of the effect of the recent development of the products and of the industry of the United States and of the resulting competition in European markets. These fears particularly apply to the agriculture of America. The taxation of real estate here is very burdensome. In America it is light. Rents must here, in large proportions, be paid to landlords. In America the farmer is usually free from rent charges. Here lands have been highly paid for. There they were bought comparatively cheap. These considerations are pressed upon the governments. It is more than possible that they will lead to palpable injustice and inequality towards the United States in the near future. Hence the question whether Congress ought not to arm the Executive with the power to impose temporarily a percentage of discriminating duties on the products of the soil and of the industry of those nations which apply discriminating duties or regulations against the products of the soil or industry of the United States.

Some two years ago I had the honor to advise you that the condition of public sentiment in this country, and on this continent generally, gave serious cause for alarm to American interests. I beg now, in view of the partial realization of those fears, to renew that declaration, and to direct attention to remedial and precautionary measures.

No. 438.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, March 19, 1881. (Received April 2.)

SIR: The interests at work to obstruct the competition of American swine meat and swine product in the markets of this monarchy have finally succeeded in their purpose.

On the 16th instant appeared here in the official journal, the Weiner Zeitung, an ordinance, of which inclosure 2 is a translation. A copy of the original publication is inclosed herewith.

I had previously private information that the two governments had resolved to effect their purpose in some form, notwithstanding the official representations I had made of the absence of just sanitary grounds on which to base such an ordinance. If my remonstrances had any effect, it was only to induce them to abstain from alleging disease in the articles prohibited. The order is a simple, naked prohibition, without alleged sanitary causes or other reasons. It might equally apply to American flour.

But this form leaves it a patent and bare violation of the fifth article of our treaty of commerce of 1829. This appeared to me to more than justify a formal protest on my part against it, even had this not been required by the instructions of the telegram addressed to me by Mr. Evarts, under date of the 25th of February. A copy of my protesting communication to Baron Haymerle is inclosed herewith, and I hope it may be approved by my government as within my instructions, and as proper in form. I could not permit to pass without protest an order so plainly ignoring the obligation of a treaty.

If they should seek to justify the order by hereafter alleging disease in the American swine product, still there remain the need of proof, and even if proved, the inequality of national treatment against which the treaty stipulates. Their own official records show the presence of the disease in the like products of neighboring countries which are not included in the prohibition. The Secretary will observe that in my two previous notes to the foreign office, I carefully kept in view the two claims of my government—actual disease to be shown and one rule to be applied to all nations without discrimination against the United States.

The injustice and inequality of the order are evident. Its folly will be apparent from the fact that it will lead to the illicit introduction of American swine meat under the disguises of other nations.

I have, &c.,

Copy of ordinance of prohibition.

Ordinance of the ministries of the interior, of commerce, and of finance, of the 10th March, 1880, relating to the prohibition of the importation of hogs, swine meat, lard, and sausages from the United States of North America.

In agreement with the royal Hungarian government, the importation of hogs, of swine meat of every kind, of lard, of sausages of every sort from the United States of North America into the Austro-Hungarian monarchy is prohibited.

This prohibition will go into force with the day of its publication.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Vienna, March 18, 1881.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, begs to call the particular attention of his excellency Baron Haymerle, imperial and royal minister for foreign affairs, to the following observations:

In the Wiener Zeitung of the 16th instant appears the following official publication:

Verordnung der Ministerien des Innern, des Handels und der Finanzen vom 10. März 1881 betreffend das Verbot der Einfuhr von Schweinen, Schweinefleisch, Speck und Würsten aus den Vereinigten Staaten von Nord-Amerika.

Im Einvernehmen mit der kön. ungarischen Regierung wird die Einfuhr von Schweinen, von Schweinefleisch aller Art, von Speck und Würsten jeder Gattung aus den Vereinigten Staaten von Nord-Amerika an die österreichisch-ungarische Monarchie verboten.

Dieses Verbot tritt mit dem Tage seiner Kundmachung in Wirksamkeit.

TAAFFE, M. P.
DUNAJEWSKI, M. P.
PINO, M. P.

From this it appears that alike in Hungary and in Austria, without previous notice to or understanding with the Government of the United States, an unconditional prohibition has been imposed on the importation of an important article of commerce, the produce of the United States. This prohibition appears to be exceptionally applied to the produce of the United States, and not to extend to other nations.

The treaty of commerce and navigation concluded between the two nations on the 27th of August, 1829, adopted a system of "perfect reciprocity, based upon principles of equity equally beneficial to both countries." Article V of that treaty, in conformity with that system, provided for mutual and exact equality of treatment, so that no other or higher duties should be imposed on the produce or manufactures of either than those imposed upon the like article the produce or manufacture of any other country. It is further, in the same article, expressly agreed as follows: "Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the importation or exportation of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States or of the dominions of Austria, to or from the ports of the United States, or to or from the ports of the dominions of Austria, which shall not equally extend to all other nations."

The Government of the United States is unable to reconcile the official order above quoted with the provisions of the treaty and the obligations imposed alike on both governments.

The undersigned must, therefore, protest in the name of his government against the said order and its enforcement, and reserves all rights of reclamation, both for his government and for its citizens, on account of the injury and damage which may result therefrom.

The undersigned begs his excellency Baron Haymerle to accept herewith the very cordial assurances of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN A. KASSON.

No. 440.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, March 25, 1881. (Received April 11.)

In the year 1753 was founded at Vienna the "Oriental Academy." It is an institution designed to prepare a corps of agents for the government, who shall be specially fitted to advance the political and commercial interests of Austria-Hungary in the Oriental world. The Government of Maria Theresa believed that persons under direct training by and allegiance to the government which they served, and with all their interests identified with the home country, would be much more useful than the natives of some foreign land who would otherwise fill these posts.

Believing, myself, that an institution under the control of our government, and designed to teach the law of nations, the law of commerce, and the languages spoken in the most important foreign countries with which we now have or desire to develop commerce, will soon be appreciated as a necessity in the United States, I have carefully inquired into the cost, management, course of study, and rules of the "Oriental Academy" at Vienna. The result of that inquiry will, I hope, not be without interest to the Department of State. My report is based upon information obtained from the director, Mr. Barb, himself an eminent linguist and Oriental scholar.

I. The number of students is limited to fifty. Any student who has finished his course of study at the gymnasium may apply for admission to the academy. Precedence is given to those who have excelled in their gymnasial studies, and eight of the best students are maintained at the academy without pay. The others must pay 800 florins annually for board and tuition. To the funds thus provided, the government adds annually 22,000 florins as its grant toward the support of the institution. The total annual cost of maintaining the academy approximates the sum of 50,000 florins. There is an entrance fee of 100 florins.

II. The course of study covers five years. The corps of professors and tutors numbers fifteen. There are two divisions of study; the first embraces jurisprudence and political science; that is to say, the diplomatic history of states and international law (taught in French), statistics, national law and financial science, commercial law and bills of exchange, civil and criminal law and modes of procedure, and the consular system. The second division is that of languages. These embrace the Turkish, the written Arabic and common Arabic, Persian, modern Greek, French, Italian, and English. The students assume no obligation to serve the state. The eight excelling students have preference of admission into the consular and diplomatic service of the East and may be also transferred into the same career in the West. The salaries of the teachers range from 600 to 3,000 florins.

III. The present organization of the academy is as follows:

PLAN OF STUDY.

DIVISION I.—LAW AND POLITICAL SCIENCE.

Criminal law and criminal course of pleading: Prof. Dr. Ritter von Keller.
Civil law: Prof. Dr. Singer.
Civil judicial procedure in and without litigation: Prof. Dr. Pann.
Law of commerce and bills of exchange: Prof. Dr. Pann.
Statistics, national economy, and financial science: Prof. Dr. von Neumann Spallart.
Diplomatic history of states and international law (in the French language): Prof. Dr. Leopold Baron von Neumann.
Consular system: Prof. Dr. Leopold Neumann.

DIVISION II.—LANGUAGES.

Turkish language: Professor Plechacsek.
Turkish language: Corregititor Pekotsch.
Grammar and literature of the Arabic written language: Lecturer, Dr. Wahrmund.

Common Arabic language: George Dellal.
Persian language: Director Barb.
Modern Greek language: Tutor Damianis.
French language: Prof. Abbé Piqueré.
French language: Prof. Bréant.
Italian language: Prof. Abbé Adami.
English language: Tutor Comarek.

IV. I append to this dispatch a copy of the regulations for the admission of students to the academy as they appeared for the current academic year 1880–'81.

Some two years ago the attention of the diplomatic and consular officers of the United States was called by the Secretary of State to the best modes of improving the commercial relations of the United States abroad. But all lines of thought lead back to deficiencies in our agencies. We have the arts of manufacture and the facilities of production in the highest degree. But, on the other hand, we have almost no ships under our own flag, under American officers, controlled by American interests, and directed to the profit of American commerce. We have few American commercial employés who speak any other language than their own. We have few native-born consuls who are really masters of any other language than the English. Even after years of employment, when they have picked up shreds of a foreign language, they are often transferred to posts where the language and the usages are wholly unknown to them. A real knowledge of the interests and wants of a foreign people cannot be acquired without the facility of a common language.

As a rule such agents content themselves with mere routine, and for ordinary intercourse depend upon some poorly paid interpreter of foreign origin, of whom the English language becomes in turn the victim. The same is true of some of our legations. The real interpreter of our interests becomes at last an irresponsible and partially educated foreigner.

It is to be greatly desired that the United States should escape from this condition of inferiority. Occupying a continent in which it may almost be said a single language is spoken, we are almost without facilities for acquiring the practical mastery and use of foreign languages. The Pacific Ocean alone separates us from the vast commercial populations for whose trade all Europe is struggling and has been struggling for a century and more—nations which embrace nearly half the population of the globe. How many of our people can speak the language of Japan, or of China, or of the Indies? Our merchants ought to control the trade of the West Indies and of the South American states. How many of our native citizens can speak the Spanish, or write an order in that language? Both for international commercial transport and for commercial intercourse, we are dependent on foreign agencies.

There is no limit to private and public expenditure for abundant native agencies of our internal development, including schools of every grade. We have our special naval school, that men may be fitted for the work of national defense and commercial protection on the seas. We have our military schools, that they may be fitted to defend the country on land. But we fit nobody for the work of developing the influence and the commerce of the United States in countries speaking other languages and having other forms of civil and social life. Yet it is in intercourse with these that our future prosperity must be largely found, and with these that our geographical situation gives us a great advantage. In those countries strangers are jealously observed. Nothing makes a man so much a stranger as the inability to converse in the common language of the people, among whom he is only one in a million.

This sentiment is practically experienced in every part of the United States, in presence of the foreign-born, numerous as they are.

It is to destroy this inability and isolation of the American representatives in Asiatic and European countries, of diplomatic, consular, and commercial representatives especially, that I venture to call your attention to this foundation of an "Oriental Academy," and to raise the inquiry whether it would not inure greatly to the advantage of the United States to establish at Washington a school of languages and international law.

It would be in accord with the purposes of the Smithsonian Institution to give room for the classes. The expense of instructors would only require a moderate grant of money by Congress. Non-partisan admission could be secured by giving to State institutions, or boards of trade, the nomination of the scholars, who should be graduates of some advanced institution of learning. Its excelling graduates should be preferred for the clerkships of the State Department, and for the consular or inferior diplomatic posts, for which they should be best fitted. For the others the mercantile houses having foreign relations and foreign agencies should be eager competitors. The French, German, Japanese, and Chinese languages should be taught both as written and spoken languages.

Our diplomatic history and treaties should be studied together with general diplomatic history and international law.

So far as the development of our foreign relations and the reform of our foreign civil service are concerned, this seems to me to open a useful line of action, to promise better things than the present time affords, and to be attainable at a slight cost to the government.

I have only to add that the director of this Oriental Academy informs me that, at present, the Austrian Government requires for its service in consular and diplomatic posts more of its graduates than are now at its command.

I have, &c.,

JOHN A. KASSON.

Competitive regulation for the pupils of the imperial and royal Oriental Academy to be received in the academic year 1880–'81.

VIENNA, August, 1880.

Those students who are candidates for admission into the imperial and royal Oriental Academy must address the requisite application to the director of the institution to be presented by the end of September at the latest.

The candidates must attach to their applications these documents:

1. Certificate of birth.
2. Testimonial of vaccination.
3. Testimonial of health.
4. All testimonials in regard to the satisfactory result of the passed gymnasial studies, including the certificate of graduation. (Maturität.)
5. All existing testimonials in regard to previous learning of foreign languages, especially of the French.

To the prescribed examination in writing for the purpose of admission which is to be held in the building of the imperial and royal Oriental Academy (3 Jacobe-gasse) only those candidates will be allowed who have duly produced the before-named documents.

The subjects of the said examination are the following:

a. History of the states composing the Austro-Hungarian monarchy.
b. A translation from Latin into German.

c. A translation from French into German.

d. A translation from German into French.

Each pupil must pay annually for board and instruction the sum of 800 florins, Austrian currency, which is to be paid in half yearly term installments in advance, at the pay office of the imperial and royal ministry of the imperial house and for foreign affairs; and further, he must, on his entrance into the academy, pay an outfit sum, occurring but once, of 100 florins, Austrian currency.

The allotment of the foundation places (by sovereign authority changed to state endowments) which are granted as emulation premiums to pupils of the institution who most excel, takes place always at the close of the academic year, or under particular circumstances also at the close of the first semestral term, and in this allotment preference is given to the students without means over those with means.

The pupils of the institution graduating as academic foundation scholars have before all others claim for consideration in filling the regular posts of consular clerks (elevs) which may become vacant; and until they may be provided for in this or in some other post in the government service, they will enjoy free board and lodging in the institution in the same manner as they had it in their former quality of foundation scholars; while on the other hand, those who during the five years' academic course of instruction were unable to obtain a foundation place can expect the appointment of regular consular clerk only as the service may require, and after the academic foundation scholars have been provided for.

No. 446.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, March 30, 1881. (Received April 20.)

SIR: In order to complete the information which I have believed to be interesting to the Department of State at Washington, I have procured copies of the official regulations established by the ministry of foreign affairs in Vienna for the examination and admission of candidates for appointment into the diplomatic and consular service.

The original and translations are transmitted herewith.

The rigidity and thoroughness of the examinations will compare well with those of undergraduates at our best institutions of learning.

Edict of the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs of December 13, 1880, relative to the requisites for admission to the concept service of the ministry within the same or abroad.

VIENNA, December 13, 1880.

Since the necessity has been manifested of a partial change in the regulations contained in the edict of the 11th April, 1869, relative to the holding of diplomatic examinations which form the condition for admission to the concept-service of the ministry of foreign affairs, the following enactments (the said edict being abolished) are hereby made known to aspirants for diplomatic service:

I. No person will be admitted to a paid place in the "concept" department, either in the service within the ministry for foreign affairs, or in an imperial and royal mission abroad, who has not passed the examination.

II. The admission to this examination is allowed by the ministry for foreign affairs only to such candidates as shall have fulfilled the following preliminary conditions:

a. The candidates must have completed their law studies in one of the universities of the empire, and must produce evidence of having there passed three theoretical state examinations with success, or have attained the degree of doctor of laws.

b. They must, in a special, prescribed preliminary examination, show thorough knowledge of the German and French languages. This preliminary examination, which is conducted before a member of the commission for the diplomatic examination in the ministry for foreign affairs, consists in the execution of a free treatise on a subject which must be offered without his being previously apprised of it. In case of total or gross deficiency in knowledge of the German or French language this examination for admission may be repeated at a fit period. The result of this examination will be orally communicated to the candidate.

c. Based on the proof of this education, and the satisfactory examination in languages, the admission of the candidate into the concept-service in the ministry for foreign affairs, or in an imperial and royal diplomatic mission abroad, takes place.

The possession of an annual income of at least 4,000 florins must be shown by documentary evidence in order to entitle to service in a mission. After one year's service in the ministry for foreign affairs, or two years at the farthest, in an imperial and royal mission abroad, the aspirant must at the next fixed period for holding the examinations, under penalty of losing his right of admission, submit to such examination (first applying in writing to the ministry for permission). Besides this application, however, the candidates who served in an imperial and royal mission abroad must transmit a treatise in the French language on the political-commercial situation, or other condition of the said foreign country, to the ministry for foreign affairs, at the beginning of the second half of the last year, through the chief of the mission, under whose special supervision the work is required to be done.

III. The diplomatic examinations are held every year in the course of the month of May or November, at the ministry for foreign affairs, by the commission appointed, with such candidates as have fulfilled the conditions prescribed in the foregoing paragraph II. One or several examinations take place at these terms, according to the number of candidates.

IV. The examining commission must consist of a chief of division, or in case he be prevented, of a court counselor of the ministry for foreign affairs, who is to act as president, and of three members; the latter are to be appointed from the higher officials of the ministry for foreign affairs, professors, or other experienced officials of the ministry. The president may examine at the close, but he is not required to do so. In case of a variance in opinion on the part of the commissioners the vote to which the president inclines is decisive.

V. The diplomatic examination is divided into one oral and one written. The latter will be first passed, and takes place on three successive days. The appointment of the days for the written and oral examination, as well as the succeeding order of the subjects, is left to the discretion of the president of the commission. There shall, however, not be an interval, of over eight days between the two examinations.

VI. Subjects of the oral examination are:

a. General European international law, especially the law of peace, of war, of neutrals, public laws of the high seas, law affecting envoys and consuls, with special reference to the peculiar Austro-Hungarian rules and international private law, especially the enactments in force in Austria-Hungary.

b. Diplomatic history of nations; formation of the system of European nations since the peace of Westphalia, and of the American States since the Independence of the United States of America, up to the present; analysis of the great international treaties, and especially those having relation to the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

c. Political economy and science of finance as applied to international relations, with a special consideration of policy, of trade and traffic, of currency and coin, of national debts, of the organization of credit and money system, &c., with continual reference to the special laws of administration.

Two subjects of questions of the law of nations, including international civil law, also on the diplomatic history of nations, must be answered in the French language.

VII. The examination in writing extends to international law, without comprising international civil law, to the diplomatic history of nations and international political economy.

On each of these subjects, a question in writing will be submitted to the candidate by the respective examining commissioner, which question relating to the two first-named subjects, is to be answered in the French language, and the question relating to the latter in German.

The candidate must prepare his compositions in a period between ten o'clock in the morning to six o'clock in the evening at the latest, under constant and careful supervision. He dare not employ any other auxiliary than the dictionaries belonging to the ministry, under the penalty of immediate annulment of the examination and unconditional rejection. At six o'clock all the compositions, whether finished or not, must be delivered to the inspector in attendance, who confirms their genuineness under his signature, and transmits them to the respective commissioner. The latter expresses in writing his vote in respect to the work, and sends both to the other commissioners, and finally to the president.

Should the examination in writing be judged by the commission as wholly unsuccessful, then the candidate will not be admitted to the oral examination. In this matter the commission alone decides.

VIII. Immediately after conclusion of the oral examination, the commissioners express their opinion, based both on their observations relative to the oral answers of the candidate, and on the written composition which they have carefully examined (after due consideration of the theoretical and practical attainments therein exhibited also of his talent of comprehension and judgment exhibited, his oral delivery and style), whether the candidate has shown or failed to show capability for the diplomatic concept-service.

IX. The commissioners must in a special report, accompanied by the compositions of the candidates and any casual private suggestions, inform the ministry for foreign affairs of their decision. In case of approval or rejection, immediately after the examination, a certificate signed by the president and the members of the commission will be delivered to the candidate, which will express the decision as to his capability, without additional remark thereto; as to his capability with unanimity; as to his capability with high distinction; in respect to some or all the subjects; or finally, decision of disapproval. In the latter case a repetition of the examination may be granted by the commission to the candidate either to take place in six months or a year; still such a repetition can take place only once and must be in the following May or November.

X. This regulation will take effect on the 1st of May, 1881.

XI. Special enactments exist for the scholars of the Imperial and Royal Oriental Academy and for consular examination.

Extract from the regulation of the year 1849 relative to the creation of posts of consular clerks (eleves).

§ 3. It is not only a primary condition for admission as consular clerk that he should be unmarried, but he must so continue during his tenure of this office.

§ 4. As conditions for attainment of the post of consular clerk, are further established:

a. Age under thirty years.

b. Jurdicial political studies finished with satisfactory result.

c. Performance of at least one year's service in concept department of the State, with public officers, where opportunity is afforded to obtain precise acquaintance with the organization and scope of the branches of the government and the forms of conducting business.

d. Commendable mental capacity and blameless moral character.

e. Complete knowledge of the German, Italian, and French languages.

f. Passing a competitive examination in writing.

§ 5. The requisite a is to be shown by a certificate of baptism; b by the testimonials of study; c and d by the reports of the official chiefs in the public offices with whom or under whose direction the candidate has served or is yet serving.

With regard to the requisite e, testimonials, duly attested by such official chiefs, are to be produced, but the result of the examination will afford satisfactory proof.

§ 6. To the competitive examination to be passed in writing only such candidates will be admitted whose possession of the requisites a, b, c, and d shall have been previously shown. The competitive examination will take place at the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs, and the time will be made known to such candidates as may be admitted to it. At this examination the candidates must, under official supervision, discuss in writing three themes or questions submitted to them, namely: One drawn from the Hungarian international law, or specially in relation to the treaties of commerce and navigation of Austria and foreign nations; one drawn from the Austrian laws and regulations relative to the consular system and relative to marine navigation; one drawn from political economy or the customs and commercial system of Austria, or from the statistics of Austrian commerce and industry.

One of these treaties must be prepared in the German, the second in the Italian, the third in the French language. The examination of the finished compositions will take place at the imperial and royal ministry for foreign affairs, and the result of it will, in connection with the requisites mentioned in § 4 and § 5, serve as reasons in influencing the nominations of consular clerks.

No. 34.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Kasson.

No. 224.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 31, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 24th of December last, (No. 400), in relation to questions arising in regard to naturalization and citizenship before your legation, has been received.

You report three cases which you have recently been called upon to deal with, and in regard to each of which you submit your action to the judgment of the Department.

The cases are stated by you with such admirable clearness that the department finds no difficulty in reaching a conclusion in respect to each and all of them; and it affords me satisfaction to be able to add that your disposition of the questions involved, accords so entirely with the views entertained by it on these questions that it only becomes necessary to approve your proceeding. That approval is unqualified. As these several rulings may, however, serve as a valuable precedent to the legation in similar questions that may arise in the future, I deem it not out of place to notice them separately and with particularity.

The first is that of Gustav Schwetzer, a native of Austria, who came to the United States in 1851, became a citizen of this republic by naturalization in 1856, returned to Europe in 1859, bearing a passport from this department, has ever since resided in Austria, has no intention to return to the United States, has since his return to Austria married there and has three children, all born in that country. In this case you properly refused to issue a passport to Mr. Schwetzer. Within the spirit of the naturalization treaty of September, 1870, between, the United States and Austria-Hungary, no less than according to the recognized general principles of public and municipal law governing expatriation, Mr. Schwetzer has in the clearest manner renounced his American citizenship. Whether or not he has in any formal manner resumed his Austrian or native allegiance is a question wholly between him and that government, and one in regard to which this government is not called upon to concern itself. In this connection your attention is directed to the answer of my predecessor, Mr. Fish, to the questions submitted by the President for the opinion of the officers of his cabinet in August, 1873, which you will find in the "Foreign Relations" of 1873, part I.

The second case is that of Anton Wurglets, a Hungarian who came to the United States in 1851, was naturalized in 1856, returned to Europe after 1867, and since 1869 has lived as a farmer in Hungary. It further appears that he had children born in the United States, who desire to return to their native land; and that his son Attila, now nineteen years old, intends to come to the United States very soon. In this case you directed the desired passport to issue, regarding, as you say, the United States citizenship of the family as continuing. I concur entirely in the conclusion thus reached by you. Were there even some room for doubt on the question, and there appears to be little or none here, in a matter of so much importance to the individuals every legal intendment should be resolved in favor of the citizenship.

The remaining case is that of Henry Huber and family and Frederick Huber and family, the facts in regard to which you thus give: The father was born in Switzerland in 1823, married there in 1846, and had five children born in that country. He came to the United States with his family in 1854; was naturalized in 1859, and returned with his family to Europe in 1860. One daughter was born in the United States in 1858. His oldest son, Heinrich, returned to this country in 1864, and still resides here; and his son Frederick married an Austrian subject in Austria in 1876, and has one child born there. The son Frederick "intends," in course of time, "to return to America." The father's "return is not distant." In this case, also, you decided to grant the passports, although it is evident that you did not consider the case entirely clear or free from difficulty. Here, also, I think you were right in resolving the doubts in favor of the citizenship. This, at least, is deemed to be the safest and best course for the executive branch of the government concerning questions partaking so much of a judicial character, and in which rights of property, as well as personal rights, may at some future time be involved. This department has always held the provisions of sections 2172 Revised Statutes as applicable to such children as were actually residing in the United States at the time of their father's naturalization, and to minor children who came to the United States during their minority and while the parents were residing here in the character of citizens. This view appears to be in consonance with the traditional policy of the government on the subject of citizenship.

Your interpretation of section 2167 of the Revised Statutes is believed to be the true one. The provisions of that section have reference to persons who come to the United States before attaining the age of eighteen years without any necessarily legal relation to the political status of the parents.

VIENNA, March 29, 1881.

The undersigned has had the honor to receive the esteemed note of the 18th instant, wherein the Hon. John A. Kasson thought proper, in the name of his government to protest against the order issued on the 10th instant, by the government of both halves of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, prohibiting the importation of swine, pork, bacon, and sausages from the United States of North America.

So far as this protest is based upon article V of the treaty of commerce and navigation, of August 27, 1829, the undersigned begs leave to remark that the prohibitory order in question was issued solely out of regard to the public health.

The stipulations of article V of the aforesaid treaty cannot be considered in this case, since the renunciation therein provided for of the issuance of orders, prohibiting importation, which are not of a general nature, cannot operate against the issuance of prohibitory orders based upon sanitary grounds.

All practice connected with treaties has confirmed this view, and this practice was enforced towards the United States of North America when Austria-Hungary was obliged to prohibit the importation of North American potatoes in order to prevent the introduction of the Colorado beetle. The American Government at that time made no objection.

The intention of the provisions of article V cannot possibly be to prevent the contracting parties from adopting such measures as may be required for the protection of public health in their respective countries. Supposing, for instance, that a pestilence should break out in one of the two countries, the country afflicted by the pestilence would have no ground of complaint against the other for a violation of the treaty if it should prohibit the importation, from the afflicted country, of any articles considered directly dangerous to health.

The case is similar, in the present instance, in which the importation of American productions has been prohibited, for the reason that the consumption of those productions must be considered, on the authority of experts, as decidedly dangerous to the public health.

The sanitary congress which met at Amsterdam in the year 1879, unanimously declared that the introduction into Europe of American pork, bacon, and sausages should, in its opinion, be prohibited.

In several places in this monarchy, especially at Trieste, since the year 1879, trichinæ have, on examination, repeatedly been discovered in American hams and shoulders.

The precautionary measures then adopted to prevent the introduction of trichinæ, consisting of a careful inspection and examination of all pork imported from North America, did not satisfy the people of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy.

The issuance of an order prohibiting the importation of swine and pork from the United States of North America, was therefore urgently demanded.

Similar orders are now in force in Italy, Germany, and France.

With regard to the failure to issue a proclamation notifying the Government of the United States, beforehand, of the proposed enforcement of the order in question, the undersigned begs leave to remark that sanitary regulations always take effect in Austria-Hungary on the day of their promulgation, and that, as a consequence, no previous notice in regard to the adoption of the measure in question could be given to the government of the country concerned.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the honorable chargé d'affaires the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

For the minister of foreign affairs,

KALLÁY.

No. 460.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, April 15, 1881. (Received May 5.)

SIR: For the purpose of covering the estimated deficiency in the budget of 1881, the Government of Austria has been authorized by a law, passed by both houses of the Reichsrath, and which has received the Emperor's sanction, to procure the sum of 50,000,000 florins, Austrian currency, through the issue of obligations of indebtedness, to be free of taxation, and not subject to conversion or redemption at any defined period, also bearing an annual interest of five per cent., payable in paper money. To effect this an emission of the amount of about 54,400,000 florins, in round numbers, being at the rate of 92, has been made by the minister of finance, which has been taken by a syndicate represented by the Bodencredit institution.

Yesterday this loan was introduced upon the Vienna Stock Exchange at the rate of 95, whereupon an enthusiastic speculation arose, and it advanced to a fraction above par. A reaction then ensuing, it closed at 98½. An evidence is hereby exhibited of the great quantity of foreign capital at present seeking investment, even in the depreciated public securities of this empire, national, as well as those of Austria and Hungary separately, all of which have long been regarded by capitalists with disfavor.

No. 471.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, May 23, 1881. (Received June 11.)

SIR: In pursuance of a law passed by both houses of the Hungarian Diet, and sanctioned by the Crown, for the conversion of the Hungarian six per cent. gold loan subscriptions to a new loan for the sum of 160,000,000 florins, bearing four per cent. interest, payable in gold, were opened on the 19th instant. The rate of subscription was fixed at 77⅜ per cent. in gold, being at about 89 per cent. in Austrian paper money. Now it has been ascertained that more than 4,000,000,000 florins, or 10,000,000,000 francs, have been subscribed. A favorable result was certainly anticipated, but in the present case it has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations, especially when it is compared with the recently successful issue of the five per cent. loan of Austria, referred to in my No. 460.

Hungary, by reason of her less cultivated soil, more sparse population, inferior means of communication, reduced amount of capital in the country, and her greater local distance from the moneyed centers of Europe, has always been obliged hitherto to contract loans on even more disadvantageous terms than Austria. The subscriptions in Austria, Hungary, and Germany are definitely estimated at 530,000,000 and 892,000,000 florins, while those in Paris and in London declared to be respectively more than 1,600,000,000 and 1,000,000,000 florins. * * * Subscribers for small amounts are for practical, if not political, reasons specially favored.

No. 2.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 9, 1881.

SIR: I transmit herewith copies of an exhaustive report, prepared by the officer of this Department who was recently detailed to make a searching and impartial investigation concerning the truth or untruth of the alarming rumors which have prevailed of late as to the alleged unhealthfulness of the pork products shipped to foreign countries from the United States.

This investigation was forced upon this government by the disastrous effects produced abroad by those rumors, and by the action of several European governments in stringently restricting or prohibiting the importation of the swine products of this country.

It was undertaken in the most impartial spirit, and with full recognition of the weighty responsibility which would rest upon this government should the prevalent rumors be substantiated. Had it been found that this great American industry was the means of disseminating disease and death abroad, no admission could have been too frank or prompt, and no repressive measures too urgent to vindicate our national good faith. As it is, the result goes beyond our most sanguine expectations in disproving the statements which have unhappily wrought such injury upon one of our most general and valuable branches of foreign commerce.

The files of your legation will show you the earnest efforts made by your predecessor to arrest the injurious rumors and prevent restrictive action on the subject by the Austro-Hungarian authorities. It is now desired that you should, after acquainting yourself with the facts shown in this report, bring it earnestly to the attention of the Austro-Hungarian government, adding thereto such representations as, in your own good judgment, may induce an abandonment or very material modification of the oppressive measures which have been adopted in Austria-Hungary with regard to the American pork trade. You may say that the entire good faith with which this investigation has been here conducted warrants us in expecting that the government of His Imperial and Royal Majesty will accept and act upon the result in equal good faith. You may also profitably advert to the singularly gratifying action of the Belgian Government, which, disregarding popular clamor and unscientific prejudice, and examining the question fairly upon its merits, reached some time since the conclusion to which this government is irresistibly led, that of the widely spread food-staples of the world's commerce, none is grown, packed, and exported under conditions more calculated to assure safety and wholesomeness than the pork product of America.

You will give to this report the widest possible publicity. A number of copies will be sent to you, for this purpose, under separate cover.

No. 6.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, July 2, 1881. (Received July 16.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 2, and of the accompanying report, embodying the results of an examination had as to the truth or untruth of the stories that American pork was largely tainted with disease. Other copies, under separate cover, have since been received. In accordance with the wishes of the Department, I have taken immediate action to give the gratifying results of this examination the widest circulation. I sent to the minister of foreign affairs a communication, in which I stated the results of the Department's investigation, and made an earnest request for an abandonment or very material modification of the oppressive measures which have been adopted in Austria-Hungary with regard to the American pork-trade.

I transmit herewith a full copy of this communication and beg leave to call the Secretary's attention to a few considerations which influenced me in drafting it.

I deemed it wise to recall the history of my predecessor's efforts to anticipate and prevent any action by His Majesty's Government. This recapitulation seemed valuable, as bringing into a single paper, for the convenience of all, the whole case as it stands to-day, and still more valuable as forcing the attention of the minister to the fact that the results of the examination strangely confirmed all the representations Mr. Kasson had made of his individual knowledge and belief.

I thought this history would also show with what zeal we had labored to escape from threatened injustice, and with what patience, under confidence of final redress, we bore the injustice when inflicted. Attention was also called to the spirit, the methods, and the results of the investigation, seriatim—the value of the conclusions depending so much upon the impartial and thorough search for the facts from which they are logically deduced.

The declarations of the Department as to the spirit of fairness and impartiality in which the investigation was inaugurated, were so frank and bold that I had no hesitation in repeating this assurance in the strongest terms; and the processes of the examination were so wise, comprehensive, and searching, that it was a pleasure to call them to attention. The results I endeavored to sum briefly and clearly, and, in sending them copies of the report, challenged them to find these results other than those properly deduced from the evidence accompanying them. Nor did I neglect to call attention to the gratifying action of the Belgian and Swiss Governments—taking care, as I was without official information, to qualify the assurance in the case of Switzerland.

In conclusion I called attention again to the patience we had shown in bearing an unnecessary restriction to our trade, to the quiet energy and transparent good faith in which the investigation was conducted, and to our exhibition of entire confidence in His Majesty's Government's readiness to undo the wrong, so soon as convinced that its view of the facts was incorrect, by refusing, except by allusion as a necessary pleading to save future rights, to urge the unpleasant charge that the restriction complained of was a gross violation of the fifth article of our treaty of commerce of 1829.

I hope the honorable Secretary will not be displeased with the position I have taken and the manner in which I have stated it; and if he shall find that any expressions in the communication to His Majesty's minister exhibit less than diplomatic indifference, that he will consider how inadequately they represent the impatience with which one bears restrictions upon trade so harmful and yet so needless.

I have, &c.,

WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS.

[Inclosure in No. 6.]

Mr. Phelps to Minister for Foreign Affairs.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES.
Vienna, July 2, 1881.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, as preliminary to certain requests he has been instructed earnestly to address to the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria and Hungary, begs leave to recall to the recollection of his excellency the minister of foreign affairs certain past facts and circumstances connected with the subject, and to present certain new ones.

On the 28th day of February last, Mr. Kasson, then the representative of the United States at this court, solicited and obtained the honor of a personal interview with the imperial and royal minister of foreign affairs. He sought this interview in a laudable desire to prevent, if possible, any governmental action which should restrict or prohibit the trade in American swine-meat. There were rumors that such action was thought of, and confident, from his own knowledge of the subject, that it was unnecessary and would work injustice, he hoped, by a frank communication of his views, to bring the Austro-Hungarian Government to the same conclusion. It was important to anticipate and prevent action, for if once taken, though it were immediately revoked, it could not fail to excite suspicion and fear in the minds of ignorant consumers, and so injure the trade.

He made a memorandum of some of the points which he urged in this interview, and by request transmitted it to the ministry of foreign affairs.

A glance at that memorandum, doubtless still on its files, will show that, on personal knowledge and belief, Mr. Kasson urged that the popular outcry against American pork was the work of speculators on the two continents, who had skillfully manipulated the press for that purpose.

That for their selfish purposes, false news, even when of a kind which would be easily and directly contradicted, was of value; and cited the familiar fact that the price of American pork, which fell when the newspapers reported a French family as ill from eating American pork, remained low and did not rise upon announcement, after official examination, that the pork was not American after all, but French; that it was in Germany that Americans first heard of trichinosis; that animal and unclean food was a necessary condition of the disease, and yet in America, and in America only, was the food of the swine confined to Indian corn, the cleanest of vegetable products.

These considerations were urged by Mr. Kasson, it will be remembered, on his own knowledge and belief. On the next day his convictions were strengthened by the receipt of a telegraphic dispatch from the Secretary of State telling him that he was authorized by his government to deny the reports of disease among American hogs. This telegram—under the promptings of the zeal he had already displayed to save His Majesty's Government from what seemed to him a needless and unjust act—he communicated immediately to the minister of foreign affairs, and included in the same communication, from information otherwise obtained, the fact that more German and Servian pork had been condemned for trichinæ than American, and that in Vienna itself hams from Westphalia had been examined and condemned for this disease.

Mr. Kasson's hopes and efforts to avert what seemed to him an error and a wrong were in vain.

On the 10th of March the joint ministries of the interior, of commerce, and of finance signed, and on the 16th of the same month published, an ordinance which, immediately and without notice, prohibited the importation of the American hog in any form in the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. The prohibition was simple and direct. It gave no reason, and it included in the proscription the hog product of no other country.

Mr. Kasson immediately, on the 8th of March, forwarded to His Majesty's minister of foreign affairs a courteous but firm protest against this action as unnecessary, invidious, and in violation of treaty obligations; unnecessary, because the cause, if as conjectured it was disease, had not been shown to exist in American pork, or if shown not shown to exist in greater degree in American than in other pork; invidious, because the ordinance, notwithstanding, excluded none other than American pork, and a violation of the obligations of the treaty of 1829, which demand that there "shall be no prohibition on imports from the United States which shall not equally extend to all other nations."

To this protest His Majesty's minister of foreign affairs made, on the 29th day of March, courteous reply, informing Mr. Kasson that the prohibition was on sanitary grounds, and giving reasons why, in the judgment of his excellency, it was not considered by His Majesty's government any infraction of the treaty.

To the American Government this reply was unsatisfactory, as it assumed the fact of disease in American pork which the American Government did not believe to be a fact; ignored the fact, which seemed to be fairly proven, that the disease did exist in other pork, and offered as reasons why the exclusive prohibition of American pork was not in contravention of the treaty, only considerations grounded on these disputed facts as premises.

And yet the Government of the United States submitted in silence, and since the ordinance, the protest, and the reply, neither Mr. Kasson nor his successors in this legation have, by oral or written applications, vexed His Majesty's government with applications for reconsideration and redress.

To save annoyance to His Majesty's government, and in reliance on its good faith and its cordial desire to do no harm to a friendly country, the American legation preferred to await the result of an investigation which the Department of State had ordered to be made concerning the truth or untruth of the alarming rumors which have prevailed of late as to the alleged unwholesomeness of the pork products shipped to foreign countries from the United States.

This investigation is now finished, and the results of it have been sent to this legation. The results so fully confirm all that Mr. Kasson claimed in the premises that the undersigned deems it his duty to lay them immediately before his excellency, and to ask for them that prompt consideration their importance demands.

It may be proper, before submitting these results, to call your excellency's attention to the spirit in which the investigation was inaugurated and the method and processes of its conduct.

The officer in charge was instructed "to make a searching and impartial investigation," and the Secretary of State affirms "that the investigation was undertaken in the most impartial spirit, and in full recognition of the weighty responsibility which rested upon the government." Could more be said for the spirit in which the work was begun?

The methods adopted to complete it were such as were best calculated to obtain the sole object of the examination—discovery of the truth.

The examination was in public, in a country where the newspapers report everything and everybody reads the newspapers, and the subject of examination was a branch of trade so general and important as to attract the attention of all.

The examination was comprehensive, not restricted or local. It did not confine itself to a single city nor to the witnesses that could be brought to a single hall. It went forth and sought its witnesses everywhere that no restrictions of person or place might narrow and color its discoveries. It sought those engaged in the different branches of trade and so conspicuous in it, that they knew their words would be read by hundreds of rivals and thousands of employés whose personal knowledge would, on the spot, convict them of any attempt at concealment, prevarication, or falsehood. But not to those who raised swine, to those who slaughtered them, to those who packed them, to those who forwarded them was the examination confined. It was not limited to those of whom it could be said "They are in the trade and sordidly interested." Guardians of the public health, officers in chambers of commerce and boards of trade, high officials in railway management, economists and scientists of high reputation voluntarily, or by request, contributed their knowledge and experience to this exhaustive investigation.

In considering the conditions under which it was held your excellency cannot attach too much importance to this consideration. The market value of the staple must rise or fall with the nature of the evidence given. Many of those who gave the evidence were in a position where some would gain by a rise and some by a fall in the price, and yet, in the bright light of the publicity, where workmen, clerks, partners, and rivals were to hear each word, none dared to tell anything except the truth, and the truth all pointed to the same conclusion: The strange exemption of the American full-grown and marketable hog from disease.

Having called his excellency's attention to the methods of the investigation the undersigned begs briefly to sum the results.

The swine in America is fed on Indian corn or maize, the cleanest of vegetable products.

American swine are not more liable to disease than European.

That diseased hogs cannot pass the inspection preliminary to slaughter; or if this is possible, hog-meat cannot pass even the most careless inspection.

That merchantable lard cannot be produced from diseased animals.

That Chicago and Cincinnati—the great pork-consuming centers—are free from trichinosis.

That in all reported cases of human suffering it has been found that the pork was eaten uncooked.

That the hogs selected for the foreign market are equal to those selected for the home market.

That the rumors of great disease in American swine came from the confused use of the words "hog" and "pig." A hog is a grown swine ready for market. A pig is a young, ungrown swine, not of age for the market. And it is among young swine, that is, among pigs, that the larger proportion of deaths by disease occur.

As the investigation was public, so are the facts elicited by it and the conclusions derived from them—public for the purpose of challenging the widest criticism. The American Goverment has published them in pamphlet form and desires to secure for them a large circulation. The undersigned has the honor to transmit herewith four copies of this pamphlet, and begs your excellency's careful attention to the contents. He would be gratified if he might trouble his excellency to make such disposition of the extra copies as will the more speedily bring them to the attention of those officers or ministers peculiarly interested in the subject.

Before addressing the request, which would naturally follow this presentation of the subject, the undersigned has the honor to suggest that if any doubt remain as to the value and truth of the results obtained by this investigation, it should not be forgotten that they are confirmed by the action of the Belgian Government. This government, disregarding popular clamor and unscientific prejudice, examined the question fairly upon its merits and reached the conclusions to which the American Government was irresistibly led, that, of the widely-spread food staples of the world's commerce, none is grown, packed, and exported under conditions better calculated to assure safety and wholesomeness than the pork product of America.

Nor will his excellency have failed to notice that Viennese journals report that the Swiss Government has followed the example of Belgium in removing all restrictions upon the importation of American pork.

In conclusion, the undersigned hopes his excellency will find ample apology for the length of this communication in the importance of the subject, one that concerns an important branch of American trade, and a restriction which his government believes to be unjust, invidious, and in violation of the treaty of commerce so long existing between the two nations; and he begs leave to inform his excellency that he is instructed by his government to bring these facts earnestly to the attention of the Austro-Hungarian Government, and to ask, in view of them, an abandonment or very material modification of the oppressive measures which have been adopted by His Majesty's government in regard to the American pork trade. He is further instructed by the honorable Secretary of State to say that the entire good faith with which this investigation has been conducted warrants the American Government in expecting that the government of His Imperial and Royal Majesty will accept and act upon the results in equal good faith.

The undersigned ventures to hope that in the consideration of this request your excellency will have in mind the patience with which a restriction—seeming to the American Government so unnecessary and unjust—has been borne; the promptitude, thoroughness, and good faith in which it put itself to the task of gathering arguments which should convince others of a needlessness and injustice, so patent to itself, and that in reliance upon the disposition of His Majesty's government to instantly remove a restriction which seemed unfriendly and harsh, so soon as convinced that it was unnecessary, it has avoided any allusion, except in the protest (where mention was made of it, that the right to plead it might not be lost), to the view the American Government believes it might take of a restriction which singles out an important product which America shall not import into Austria-Hungary, but all other countries may, as a plain and palpable violation of the treaty of 1829, and bearing these evidences of American patience, faith, and good-will in mind, that your excellency will be pleased to give this matter prompt attention.

The undersigned takes this opportunity to express to his excellency the imperial and royal minister of foreign affairs his most distinguished consideration.

No. 9.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Vienna, July 15, 1881. (Received July 30.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Department's dispatches* numbered 3 and 4.

Both refer to the desire and attempt of the Colombian Government to secure the protectorate of the leading European powers for the Isthmus. Dispatch No. 4, which conveys the fortunate discovery by the Department that the desire of the Colombian Government has passed into an effort making or to be immediately made, was received this morning.

In view of the importance of the subject, I thought no time should be lost in laying the matter, as I was instructed to do, before His Majesty's minister of foreign affairs. I immediately sought an interview, which was promptly accorded, and it is of that interview I beg leave to present this minute. The Baron Haymerle, minister of foreign affairs, has been and for some weeks will continue absent from his post, being at some watering place on the Rhine. Baron Kallay, in his absence, represents him at the ministry.

I laid the matter fully, clearly, and frankly before Baron Kallay in a private interview. I read to him slowly and carefully the complete statement of our case, so well put in the Department's first dispatch on the subject. I took advantage of my right to suppose that the minister's knowledge of the tongue in which the dispatch was written was not so perfect, but that he might be glad to receive a running commentary and analysis in the simpler language of the salon, and this enabled me at least to perceive still more clearly, and I hope it did him, how strong was the case of the government even in literary or undiplomatic dishabille.

I labored in respectful but earnest language to enforce your stronger reasons—that it was not the birth of a new and aggressive spirit, prompted by the nation's rapid and imperial growth, but only an old policy and the declaration of an old right, which was founded in solemn treaty more than a generation ago.

I impressed upon him that the treaty was not one the value of which we had but recently discovered, but that at the time we knew and felt its value, and since on frequent occasions, by acts in its defense and by frequent and formal statements, we had made it plain that we still recognized the value of what we had in 1846 acquired, and that we meant to keep it.

I hope I made plain to him the distinction between a commercial neutrality and a political one, and that while in commerce we claimed nothing more on any isthmian highway of land or water than belonged to the world, yet, in the view of international policy, a view which would become practical almost exclusively in time of war, we claimed the rights given us by the treaty—political rights which, by its provisions, we shared only with the United States of Colombia.

I suggested that as we did not interfere with European protectorates or guarantees where European interests were chiefly concerned, that it was not reciprocal or just for the European powers to interfere in American where American interests were preponderant.

I also read to Baron Kallay extracts from the President's explicit statement at his inauguration as to his policy—following the historical policy of our government—in that regard. Of dispatch No. 3, and of this extract, I promised, at the Baron's request, to send him copies.

His comments were brief and can be briefly stated:

"This was the first his government had heard of it."

"His government's interest in the question was very slight."

"His government would certainly take no initiative in the matter."

"He would study the question, but he doubted if it would give either of us any trouble."

The general impression, with which a pleasant interview terminated, was that Baron Kallay as yet had heard no mention of any application as likely to be made by the Colombian to the Austria-Hungarian Government, and that Austria-Hungary really felt very little interest in the question.

Mr. Putnam to Mr. Evarts.

No. 51.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Brussels, February 9, 1881. (Received February 24.)

SIR: My predecessor, in his dispatch No. 70, gave an account of the controversy over the new school law of 1879 for Belgium. He stated that the law was resisted by the Roman Catholic priesthood as an attempt to overthrow the religion of the country, while it was admitted by the liberal party and the state ministry that it was designed to lessen the priestly domination in secular affairs; that by the law of 1842 the priests had the right, in common with the civil authorities, to have committees selected from their order to inspect all the public schools, and the right of appointment of teachers, and, in fact, had almost exclusive management of the secular education of the youth of Belgium; that in the normal schools from which school instructors came it was taught that Leopold and Belgium were second to the Pope and Rome; that under the new law a state normal school superseded that institution, and priests could no longer act as school inspectors, public secular education being wholly placed under control of officers of the state, and that a bitter controversy had grown out of this movement.

As this domestic question of Belgium has attracted wide attention, I have thought a brief statement of its present status and relations might be of interest. For a just appreciation of the subject, two facts in Belgian politics and society should be noted. First, that Belgium is, and for centuries has been, an intensely Roman Catholic country. The Protestant element numerically is so insignificant that it is not a considerable factor in Belgian society. The "liberal" element not in sympathy with any religious organization, yet intense in its political character, is undoubtedly strong in the large towns, and acts politically with the "liberal" in contradistinction from the ultramontane party.

The second fact is the liberal character of Belgian political institutions. Monarchical in form, the government has the spirit of a free republic, and has laid the basis of individual liberty as maintained by modern constitutional governments in its fundamental law. The following are some of its provisions relating to education and worship:

> Freedom of worship and its public exercise, as well as the right of expressing opinions upon every question, guaranteed, saving the punishment of crimes committed during the exercise of these rights. No person can be required to take part in any manner whatsoever with the acts or ceremonies of any form of worship, nor to observe any days of rest.
> Teaching is free. Every preventive measure is prohibited; the repression of crimes is regulated only by law.

Founded in 1830 by a revolution which separated the kingdom from Holland, the first two years after its independent organization the exigencies of the new state prevented the development of sharply defined parties, and it was not until the country felt well assured of its unquestioned independence that radical differences of opinion sought very distinct party organization.

The policy of King Leopold I of selecting a mixed ministry of strict Catholics and Liberals, with the hope of preventing the antagonism of parties, largely contributed to this passive condition.

But it is no less true that in the very beginning there were the elements which would not permit Belgium to escape the internal collisions incident to all free states. The attitude of Gregory XVI toward the liberal features of its constitutional power fully contributed to shape the future politics of the country. In his Encycle of 1832 he declared that—

> Indifferentism alone could flow from that absurd and erroneous maxim, that it was necessary to guarantee and assure to all liberty of conscience.

He condemned the liberty of the press and declared that—

> Calamity to religion and governments must be the result of following the wishes of those who would separate the church from the state, and would break the mutual concord between the priesthood and the civil authority.

The leading Catholic press of Belgium, as well as the Catholic colleges and seminaries, took the position of hostility to the liberal features of the constitution before the famous syllabus of Pius IX, and since that time that attitude has been uncompromisingly maintained by them.

In a dispatch of Frère Orban, minister of foreign affairs, to the chargé d'affaires of Belgium near the Holy See, of date November 12, 1878, he says:

Liberal Catholics have been pursued in later years with great rigor. Their opinions have been condemned by Pius IX, and themselves declared more dangerous than communists. They are denounced as enemies of religion, although the immense majority of them profess the Catholic faith. In the schools opened by the clergy all the public liberties are treated as dangerous heresies.

To maintain his declarations he quotes from several Belgian Catholic journals. From the Bien Public as follows:

What is liberal Catholicism except an absolute error which expects excellent results from a policy based upon the false and mischievous principle of liberty in all things, and for all. We cannot see in the provisions of our constitution fundamental laws which are appropriate for a people ripe for their liberty. We believe, on the contrary, that legislation full of scepticism, neutral between error and truth, as foreign to religion as to geometry, indifferent to the rights of God, opening the door to blasphemy and corruption.

The Gazette de Liege says:

In presence of the false principles laid down in the Belgian Constitution, the ecclesiastical authority discharges its duty in making known to the people the points which need amendment.

The Catholic et Politique, of March, 1878, says:

We shall make the complete modification of the constitution in a Catholic sense the end of our efforts. To be a child of the church, it is necessary to accept with all our hearts the condemnation recently uttered by her in the syllabus of 1864 and the encycles of 1832 and 1864. It is hard for some, but not less an obligation indisputable. Our adversaries know this as well as we do, and on every occasion they repeat it to the good members of the right and blow the constitutional trumpet as if there had been no syllabus. * * * We shall accord nothing to them which can harm the church; neither the constitution nor justice can make us yield such concessions.

Our adversaries have liberty of press, liberty of education, liberty of worship, liberty of association. Let them keep them so long as we have not the right by a revised constitution to take them from them.

The following is from an address of the Bishop of Liege:

No Catholic can, in conscience, hereafter vote at any political or administrative election in favor of a candidate belonging to the so-called liberal associations, or patronized by them.

The foregoing will, I think, sufficiently illustrate the antagonism of which I have spoken. It has been a cardinal doctrine of the liberals, that the state schools should be wholly separated from the control of the church, and whenever they have been in power they have proposed a modification of the school law which would transfer the control of the public education of the youth of the country from the priests to the officers of the state and the municipalities, and in this have been opposed by the Catholic party. As a very able and devoted press was in the hands of the latter interest, and as all the educational institutions of the country were under priestly management, it is easy to see that the liberals would regard the lessening of that clerical influence over the peasant population a first necessity, not only on the lower ground of fortifying their own position as a party, but from the higher motive of bringing the educational system of the country into harmony with the constitution.

Therefore, it was almost a matter of course that upon the advent to power of the liberals in 1878, under the leadership of Mr. Frère Orban, the modification of the school system should be a foremost measure of their administration.

In January, 1879, the new school law was passed. It transfers the entire control of public education to the state and municipal governments, and wholly separates the secular side of the schools from the church. But while it does this, it makes certain provisions for the religious education of the children in accordance with the faith of their families, and leaves absolute freedom to establish private or parochial schools. Article 4, of Title 1, of the law is as follows:

Religious instruction is left to the care of families and to the clergy of the different forms of worship. A room in the school is put at the disposition of the clergy to give therein, either before or after school hours, religious instruction to the children of their communion attending the school.

ART. VII. The teacher shall neglect no occasion to inspire the pupils with respect for the national institutions and the public liberties.

Accompanying the law is an "exposé" of its motives, in which it is stated that—the school law of 1842 imposed upon the state the obligation to include in public primary instruction, a religious dogmatic education; that experience had demonstrated the impossibility of reconciling the application of that principle with the spirit of the Belgian constitution, which separated in the most absolute manner the state from churches; that the constitution established among different faiths absolute equality; that the law of 1842, relating to primary education, had, in violation of this principle, required the state to associate its action in the school with the action of a favored church, that representing a majority of the pupils of the school.

Recognizing the fact that the immense majority of the pupils are of the Roman Catholic religion, provision had been made by the new law by which the clery could give daily religious instruction to the pupils; that if this privilege was not availed of, the teachers, if willing so to do, would hear recitations from the religious text-books of the church, and if unwilling, some other proper person would be appointed for that purpose.

Before the passage of the law the church authorities resisted its passage with all their ability, and after it was put in operation, their opposition was uncompromising. The state schools were declared to be "Godless" and nurseries of atheism and immorality.

The following is from a mandate of the Catholic bishops to the lower orders of their clergy:

The holy communion must be publicly refused—

1st. To instructors who without special license or dispensation exercise their functions in an official school.

2d. To active members who serve upon the school committees.

3d. To school inspectors, principal or cantonal.

4th. To all persons who publicly and actively favor the state schools, and are their defenders and protectors. All to be first forewarned.

5th. When it is a question of administering the last sacraments, one rule must be observed. In extremes, extremes must be resorted to. So that if nothing else can be obtained, it will suffice if the sick will promise to do everything which the church requires of him.

The clergy at once organized church schools in their parishes throughout the kingdom, to which Catholic parents were required to send their children.

The state schools suffered so much under these attacks from pulpit, press, and the execution of the mandate of the bishops, losing, as they did, a large percentage of their pupils, although in many instances the old teachers were retained, that at the succeeding session of the House of Deputies a committee was raised to take testimony in the different cantons as to the operation of the law and the action of the church authorities. That committee has been engaged for several months, taking testimony in the different cantons, and hundreds of witnesses have been examined; with few exceptions they reveal a single line of action. The testimony of most any one of the witnesses taken at random will reveal about the same facts.

Refusal of the sacraments to teachers, to school committees, and to parents sending their children to the state schools.

Refusal of the holy communion to the dying except upon promise to transfer their children to the church schools.

Refusal of absolution to the same parties.

Refusal of first communion to the children attending the state schools.

Some of the witnesses testify that wives who are named were in some instances advised by their priests to desert their husbands and to beg from door to door with their children, rather than live with the fathers who would send their children to the state schools. In other cases, according to the evidence, children are advised to leave their parents for the same reasons.

Such is the present attitude of the controversy and both parties are preparing to make their appeal upon the school-law issue to the ballot in 1882.

As the suffrage is qualified in Belgium by a small tax-paying test, a large majority of the peasant population who mostly support the clergy in the conflict, have no vote for members of either house of Parliament. This gives to the liberal party, which is strong in the large towns, an advantage they seem confident of maintaining. But should a reaction restore the Catholic party to power, and they should be able by a two-thirds vote to change the organic law by broadening the basis of suffrage so as to include the peasantry in the voting class, such a change would enable them to establish and long maintain the former system. It may be doubted whether any party will attempt so radical a measure.

To one who has witnessed the conflicts of parties over the slavery question in the United States, or noted the political struggles of the century under constitutional governments, there is nothing in this controversy to surprise; it is Belgium's "irrepressible conflict between opposing and enduring forces." The Catholic party accepts the doctrines of the syllabus, and believe there can be no virtuous society and no pure and stable government except in accordance with the principles of that authoritative declaration. The liberals on the other hand, as absolutely accept the modern doctrine that the state is and should be supreme and wholly separate from any church; that the citizen should look to it for his secular education and that while seeking religious guidance at the hands of a consecrated clergy, his manhood should be trained to intelligent and independent individualism in all citizen relations.

The struggle is interesting as it represents a leading conflict between opposing ideas of the century. Incidental to this controversy occurred the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Holy See. Through a voluminous correspondence and in many speeches before the House of Deputies, Mr. Frère-Orban, secretary of foreign affairs, represents the alleged approval by the Pope of the hostile action of the bishops to the school law, while, as the secretary insists, the Pope was representing to the Belgian Government his disproval of it to have been the immediate cause of the rupture. The cardinal secretary, on the other hand claims that the attitude of his Holiness had been uniform.

It should be added that it is the theory of the liberal party that since the suppression of the temporal power there is no good reason why Belgium should maintain diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

Brussels, February 25, 1881. (Received March 10.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that an incident in the debates of the House of Deputies of Belgium on the 22d instant was the following brief discussion upon the question of diseased American pork.

Mr. WILLEQUET. A decree of the French Government has prohibited the introduction of American salt pork provisions. This measure has produced some disquiet in our country. I rise to ask if there are any dangers arising from their use in Belgium.

Mr. ROLIN-JACQUEMYNS, minister of the interior. No case of trichinosis has been discovered in our country. Some cases of it have been found in pork destined for foreign countries, which were in transit through Belgium. Moreover, all danger disappears when the meat is sufficiently cooked.

Mr. DE DECKER: Salt pork provisions constitute one of the important branches of the commerce of Antwerp. I believe there is no real danger, and I hope the Belgian Government will not follow the example of France.

I regard the statement of Mr. Rolin-Jacquemyns, the secretary of the interior, indicative of the friendly policy of the Belgian Government toward our salt meat provisions entering the port of Antwerp.

SIR: I have the honor to state that finding in the London morning papers of the 6th instant a telegram from the United States embodying the substance of the resolutions of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, and the Indianapolis Board of Trade, relating to the alleged diseased condition of American pork exported to Europe, also the substance of a communication of the English consul at Indianapolis to the English consul at Philadelphia, certifying the generally healthy character of that branch of our commerce, I inclosed it to-day with a note to the minister of foreign affairs, calling his attention to the statements. I handed it to Baron Lambremont, the chief secretary, and had some conversation with him on the general subject.

He stated that the action of the French Government in relation to American meats had made a "panic" in Belgium, particularly among the peasantry, with whom our hams and lard are a large element of subsistence. The lard is used in place of butter. That it was the purpose of the Belgian Government to thoroughly examine the questions involved, which were, first, Are American salt provisions diseased, as alleged? Second, If so, is the difficulty overcome by proper care in their cooking? That it was a very important matter, both to the United States and to Belgium, and the government wished to learn the exact facts.

He spoke with all due reserve, but it is my opinion that the Belgian

Government will take no prejudicial action in the matter except upon positive proof that sanitary considerations demand it. I believe the feeling here is most friendly to that branch of our commerce on general principles. How little the government is disposed to yield to any panicky feeling I think I revealed by my dispatch No. 54.

SIR: Your No. 54, of the 15th ultimo, giving the outline of a recent interpellation in the House of Deputies touching the importation into Belgium of American salt-pork provisions, has been received. It is gratifying to perceive that the Belgian cabinet is disposed to look at the question fairly and practically, and without heeding the adverse clamor against American pork which is now prevalent in certain quarters of Europe, and which the earnest inquiries of this government fail to trace to any other source than nefarious speculation to the injury of legitimate trade.

I have telegraphed to our legations in London, Paris, and Vienna emphatic denial of the alleged alarming mortality among American hogs. The concurrent testimony of the great packing centers of the West is that the swine of that region have never before been so free from contagious disease or mortality.

No. 60.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Brussels, March 25, 1881. (Received April 11.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that yesterday Monsieur Descamps was elected president of the Chamber of Deputies, or, as we should say, "Speaker of the House," in place of Mr. Guillery, who resigned a few days since, after three and a half years' service. His resignation was the culmination of a sharp debate over a question of parliamentary rule. Mr. Guillery, as well as Mr. Descamps, is a member of the liberal party, of which Mr. Frère-Orban, minister of foreign affairs, is the recognized leader.

The liberal ministry, among other acts, introduced a measure cutting off the salaries of priests officiating in the barracks of the soldiers. It was stoutly resisted by the Catholic party, who regard it one of a series of measures seeking to separate the church from the state.

In the course of the debate on the war budget, Mr. Woeste, of the Right, said he had always before voted the war budgets, but the minister of war had proposed several party measures which the army had severely condemned.

Mr. Frère-Orban, minister of foreign affairs, in a very animated speech declared these words tended to anarchy, insubordination of the army, and revolt, and demanded that the member be called to order. This is understood to involve a degree of censure much stronger than the same call in our Congress.

Mr. Woeste, in response to the request of the president to withdraw his words, did withdraw them as "inopportune," but declared at the same time they expressed his opinion.

The president then ruled there was no occasion for the call to order, of the propriety of which he claimed he was the sole judge.

The minister of foreign affairs appealed to the house from the decision of the chair.

The president stated that such an appeal was an encroachment on his prerogative; that an appeal to the house against the decision of the president had not been made in fifty years, and his own dignity and self-respect demanded his adherence to the usage. He would not put the vote on the appeal, and tendered his absolute resignation.

The incident caused quite a "flurry," and the parliamentary question remains undecided.

No. 67.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Brussels, April 30, 1881. (Received May 16.)

SIR: Referring to my dispatches, Nos. 54 and 59, relating to the favorable expressions of the Belgian Government regarding American pork, I have the honor to inclose herewith a circular letter from the minister of the interior on the same subject, published this morning in the official journal. The subject-matter, after the prohibitory action of the French Government, was referred to the official council of public health, and the minister of the interior states that he has adopted the conclusions of the council in their fullest extent.

The substance of their report, made after careful examination, is as follows:

1st. That disease generated by trichinose is unknown in countries where, as in Belgium, pork is sufficiently cooked; that it has been demonstrated by many experiments that the trichinose cannot resist a temperature of 56° centigrades, and that they are invariably killed at a temperature of 75° to 100° C.

It is important [continues the report] to make known the fact that pork well cooked whatever trichinose it may contain is entirely inoffensive, and that consequently no one need suffer from this cause unless he wishes to, and nothing is necessary except scrupulous persistence in use of needful precautions of the kitchen.

It concludes with a few details of the proper method of cooking pork, and the circular letter of the minister of the interior closes as follows:

These simple and easy precautions are dictated by experience and recommended by those most competent to judge. I pray you, Monsieur le Gouverneur, cause them to be published in the official journal, to the end that the communal administrations may bring them to the knowledge of all citizens, and that they may receive the widest publicity.

This final action of the Belgian Government, from considerations so broad and just, is in accord with its original determination to make no change in its friendly policy toward that branch of our commerce, except upon good and sufficient reasons.

The action of the French Government naturally created a distrust among the peasantry of Belgium. That distrust, amounting to a panic, has been met by the Belgian Government in the just and enlightened manner I have herein indicated.

I have assured the Government of Belgium that the Government of the United States will learn with great satisfaction of this its action, based upon a careful and scientific examination of the whole question.

No. 50.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Putnam.

No. 46.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 31, 1881.

SIR: By dispatches received from the minister of the United States in Central America, this Department has been informed that the governments of Costa Rica and Colombia have executed a convention by which (article 1) the Republic of Costa Rica and the United States of Colombia agree to submit to arbitration the question of boundaries existing between them and the designation of a line which shall divide forever and with all clearness, the territory of the first from the territory of the second, each one remaining in full, quiet, and peaceful dominion with respect to each other, of all lands left on its side of the aforesaid line, which shall remain without special charge or grievance whatever in favor of the other.

Under article 5, in consonance with the preceding articles, and for their execution, the high contracting parties name as arbitrators: His Majesty the King of the Belgians; in the unlooked-for case that he shall not choose to accept, His Majesty the King of Spain; and in the event, equally unlooked for, that he shall also refuse, His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic, in all of whom the high contracting parties "have, without any difference whatever, the most unlimited confidence."

This convention was signed in San José on the 25th December last; was ratified by the council of state of Costa Rica, signed by President Guardia, and transmitted to the Colombian Government for due ratifications.

No formal communication, either by the Republic of Costa Rica or the United States of Colombia, has been made to this government, of their intention to negotiate or the actual execution of this convention; and we are still without information of its ratification by the Government of Colombia.

It is sufficient for your present instruction to say that the boundary in dispute is the line of territorial division between the Republic of Costa Rica and the State of Panama, one of the component states of the United States of Colombia, and its final settlement by this arbitration will define the limits of the State of Panama and the extent of the rights of the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over its territory.

You are aware that by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of 1846-'48, with the United States of Colombia, then known as New Granada, the United States of America guaranteed not only the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, but the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over the territory of that state. You will observe by reference to the provisions of that treaty that this obligation was assumed by the United States of America, not only that any interoceanic communication through the isthmus might be protected by the power of the United States of America, but that they should also be in position to assert and maintain the rights which they have acquired under the treaty. This guarantee is therefore not only an obligation which they may be called on to perform upon the demand of the United States of Colombia, but it is also a right which they may claim to exercise in their own discretion, for the maintenance of their own interests.

The effort, apparently a very earnest one, which is now being made to construct an interoceanic canal across the isthmus, and the necessity which this government now recognizes of establishing under its treaty privileges such coaling and naval stations on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the isthmus as will enable it to discharge, if required, the obligations of guarantee which it has assumed, make it a matter of direct interest to the United States of America to have ascertained what are the limits of the State of Panama, and especially its littoral extent on either ocean.

The guarantee of the United States of America has now been in force for over thirty years, and upon more than one occasion they have been called upon to discharge the duties which it imposes, in the interests of other powers, while recent events have given increased and increasing importance to the rights which it confers, it cannot be a matter of indifference to the United States of America whether the littoral line of either ocean in the neighborhood of any projected interoceanic communication is within the guaranteed territory of the United States of Colombia, or within the lawful boundaries of the Republic of Costa Rica, with whom its treaty obligations are of a different character.

While, therefore, the Government of the United States of America does not claim or desire that the Republic of Costa Rica and the United States of Colombia should on all questions of difference which may arise between them seek either the advice or arbitration of this government, I cannot but feel that in a question of such direct concern to its interests and to its treaty rights and obligations it was not only warranted in expecting the formal communication of such action as has been already taken, but that its opinion, both as to the character of the submission and the selection of any arbitrator to be chosen, is entitled to the most respectful consideration.

It belongs, of course, to His Majesty the King of the Belgians to determine how far his acceptance of the arbitration which has been asked of him, will be influenced by the fact that he may be called upon to decide questions of grave consequence and direct interest to this government, which have been raised without our knowledge, and are to be settled without our participation. But it is proper, in order to avoid any future misunderstanding, or anything that may then be construed into intentional disrespect of the decision which His Majesty may make, that His Majesty should be informed that while the Government of the United States has neither formed nor desires to express any opinion upon the merits of the convention between Costa Rica and the United States of Colombia, yet it will not hold itself bound by any decision which would modify or limit either the rights or interests which may have been secured to it by the treaty of 1846, the obligations of which it has discharged, from the date of its signature to the present day, with scrupulous fidelity, unless it has had full opportunity to explain and enforce those rights and interests before an arbitrator in whose appointment it has been consulted and in whose selection it has concurred.

The method in which you will make this communication must be left to your own judgment. I desire, if possible, to avoid a communication so formal that it might be misinterpreted into a protest, and you will take care before approaching the subject at all to learn that the invitation to arbitrate either has been, or will positively be, given to His Majesty.

Should it then become necessary you will take care that your representation of the feelings and opinions of your government are made in the most respectful form, and you will endeavor to satisfy His Majesty that they are communicated to him with no pretensions of interference with the exercise of his own discretion, but with the earnest desire of guarding against the possibility of such a misunderstanding on his part of the position of the United States of America as might tend to diminish the friendly feeling and high consideration for His Majesty which this government has always entertained and expressed.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: I had the honor, in a late communication, to state that I had the pleasure of forwarding to my government the recent letter of Mr. le Ministre of the Interior concerning American pork, and that I felt sure it would be received with great satisfaction.

I have now the honor to state that I am in receipt of a dispatch from the Government of the United States which states that "The President is much gratified by the exhibition of the candid spirit revealed by the letter of His Majesty's minister." It also instructs me to make known to His Majesty's minister the satisfaction with which my advisement of the action of the Belgian Government on the subject matter of my note has been received.

In view of the exceptional circumstances in which that branch of our commerce finds itself in some European quarters, without, as my government believes, any justifying reason, the broad commercial spirit of the Belgian Government is specially grateful to the people and Government of the United States.

I avail myself of this occasion, Monsieur le Ministre, to thank you for the interesting information you have been pleased to give me relative to the experiments made to determine whether or not trichinose existed in the provisions in question.

No. 74.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Brussels, June 27, 1881. (Received July 9.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that your dispatch No. 46, relating to the proposed treaty arbitration between the governments of Costa Rica and Colombia, duly arrived at the legation.

An incident which occurred within a few days left no doubt in my mind that the question of His Majesty's acceptance of the trust as arbitrator had in some form come before him for his consideration. I felt so assured of it that I felt justified in calling upon Baron Lambermont, assistant secretary of the foreign office. I soon introduced the subject of the treaty, and stated that I was under the impression that His Majesty had the subject of acting as arbitrator between those two governments under consideration, if he had not already decided as to its acceptance. He said that as yet His Majesty had not received the formal official notice, but that informal communications on the subject had been made to the foreign office by the minister of Costa Rica. This satisfied me that I did not mistake in believing that the subject-matter of accepting the appointment had already, at least informally, been placed before His Majesty, and that the necessary formal notice—necessary even that the office of arbitrator might be declared and the duty transferred to His Majesty the King of Spain—would be positively given.

I stated to Baron Lambermont that, as he was aware, the Government of the United States had very important treaty rights and obligations in connection with the isthmus and territory of the State of Panama. That there were special and controlling reasons why the Government of the United States felt it due both to His Majesty and to itself that if the question of acting as arbitrator was presented to His Majesty he should be advised of the exact position of the Government of the United States toward the proposed arbitration; that it deemed this necessary to prevent any future misunderstanding or misapprehension on the part of His Majesty that might arise from any attitude the Government of the United States might feel it its duty hereafter to take, in view of its existing treaty rights and obligations; that I was instructed by my government if the question of acting as arbitrator was submitted to His Majesty, to seek an opportunity in a method most agreeable to himself to present to him its position in connection with the proposed arbitration; that the object was not to seek to influence in any degree any decision of His Majesty, nor to present any view of its own on the question to be submitted, but solely that its own position in connection with the arbitration might be understood by His Majesty; that it felt all the more desirous that it be understood because of the high consideration the government entertained for His Majesty.

Baron Lambermont asked me if my instructions were to present what I might have to communicate in writing. I replied that my government, I felt, would prefer a less formal method, as what it desired was in as simple manner as possible to make known its own position, as I had stated. At this point in the interview the assistant secretary said he would ask in Mr. Orban, chief of the "Direction Politique" of the office of foreign affairs, with whom all the communications on the subject had been made.

I repeated in substance to Mr. Orban, on his coming in, what I had previously stated to Baron Lambermont. He confirmed the statement of the baron, that the communications relating to the acceptance by His Majesty of the office of arbitrator had so far been informal; that it was proper His Majesty should be informed of the position of the Government of the United States to the proposed arbitration; that after the official notice had been duly given and His Majesty had decided to accept the trust, should he so decide, the opportunity I desired would be afforded me. I then replied that my government might desire its position to be understood by His Majesty while yet deliberating upon the question of accepting the office of arbitrator, that the subject might be fully before him, and, if so, that I would be glad of the opportunity to present it at that stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Orban then said:

I see your view, Mr. Minister. This is the situation. The treaty provides its arbitrator in this order:

1st. The King of Belgium.

2d. The King of Spain.

3d. The President of the Argentine Republic.

As yet only informal communications on the subject have been made. After the formal official notices have been given and before His Majesty's decision upon the question of acting as arbitrator, you will undoubtedly have the opportunity you wish, as you have here expressed, and be duly advised through the foreign office. This subject will be laid before the minister of foreign affairs, who will doubtless inform His Majesty.

With that understanding terminated the official interview. Nothing could be more kind than the manner in which the subject, as I presented it, was treated. I entered into no details, generalizing throughout as I have indicated.

BOLIVIA.

No. 55.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Evarts.

No. 43.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
La Paz, November 12, 1880. (Received December 27.)

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a brief report of the political situation in Bolivia, since my last dispatch upon that subject, No. 27, dated September 3 last.

During the absence of the ministers and myself at Arica, everything was very quiet, especially as it was generally believed that our mediation would certainly bring about peace, if not directly at least by arbitration.

In that sense the National Assembly of Bolivia after a session of five months adjourned sine die on October 24, without passing any direct laws looking towards an active prosecution of the war. It gave, however, full powers to the President as to the enrollment of troops, the raising of a foreign loan, in compliance with which a financial agent has already been sent to Europe, the purchase of arms and employment of other means for defense; it approved the Bravo concessions, in spite of Peru's protest, for the colonization of its eastern territories and building of highways, railroads, and canals from the east via the La Plata and Amazon Rivers, and it referred the acceptance of the Peru-Bolivia confederation to popular vote in the future; so that for the present that brilliant idea of Dictator Périola of Peru may be considered a failure; it passed an excellent mining law, and in general, being very conservative, may be considered to have worked for the interest of the country as best it could.

The Government of Bolivia having declined to declare commercial interdiction with Tacna and Arica at the request of Peru, the prefect of the narrow strip of country still nominally occupied by Peruvians between the above places, and the borders of Bolivia, had imposed upon all goods passing through his jurisdiction a transit duty in itself forbidding all trade, and had actually seized goods then en route for nonpayment, which action excited the public feeling here very much, and came near leading to a rupture, but the Peruvian minister at La Paz ordered the goods released and a compromise was effected, whereby an additional 5 per cent. duty is to be paid to Peru, so that with the duties to Chili, Peru, and Bolivia, about 65 per cent. ad valorem, and the enormous costs of transportation prices of even the necessaries of life and especially clothing have risen to extreme figures, while money retains its full value, exchange being almost at par.

When the failure of the conferences became known here, the President made a spirited address to the troops in public; but the people are very dejected, an invasion is feared, and especially the inhabitants of this city already see their property burned and destroyed, and themselves fleeing from the cruelty and brutality of the enemy, their only hope being still that in some way or other the United States will intervene in what is now considered by all the most cruel and barbarous war of devastation, vandalism, and conquest on the part of the enemy, and that no mercy need be expected.

Minister Carrillo informed me yesterday that he, with his colleagues of the cabinet, had resigned, being forced thereto on account of the failure of the mediation; that they having held out the hope of peace to the country, and being unsuccessful, must now leave the work to others, who propose a different policy, and that the change in the cabinet would take place as soon as their report of the matters connected with the mediation with the protocols of conferences at Arica is published and submitted to the country.

What the future will bring, it is impossible to say; a hope still remains that the Argentine Republic may take part in the war against Chili; but I have not much confidence in this, and the present allies, I believe, will have to fight to the bitter and scarcely doubtful end.

Report of the Bolivian plenipotentiaries.

PLENIPOTENTIARIES OF BOLIVIA ON SPECIAL MISSION,
La Paz, November 5, 1880.

To the MINISTER OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS:

SIR: We have the honor to transmit to the department with this report the autograph protocols of the peace conferences which have taken place in the waters of Arica and on board of the American corvette Lackawanna, between the plenipotentiaries of the three republics engaged in the present struggle of the Pacific.

In accord with the high and sincere sentiments of the national government, we have tried, with decided ardor, to arrive at an arrangement for peace compatible with the honor of the allied republics and the great interests of South America.

We understood that such result would not be probable if we did not accept to a certain extent the necessary effects produced by the advantages gained on the battlefield. This consideration induced us to calculate quietly the favorable results which the allies might obtain, as well as the sacrifices which they might have to make without loss of dignity, not vaguely invoked, but defined in the course of events.

At the first step of the negotiations the designation of the place for the conferences became a point of diplomatic consideration, and might have definitely made these impossible. To obviate this incident, we agreed that one of us should go to Arica on a particular mission, accompanied by their excellencies the American ministers, Messrs. Christiancy and Adams, which was done with the consent of their excellencies the plenipotentiaries of Peru. There we were enabled to speak to the delegate from the most excellent the Government of Chili, who transmitted to it our different conciliatory propositions, which were, however, decidedly rejected. On our responsibility thereupon, we chose that the negotiations should take place on board of the corvette Lackawanna, in the waters of Arica. The estimable arguments of their excellencies the ministers of the United States in the same sense facilitated the final opening of the conferences.

In these we maintained the same spirit which animated us. In the first we expressed our hope that the most excellent negotiators might consider the subject in accordance with its responsibility and as Americans, putting aside the inspirations of interior politics and the popular clamor of the day, considering only the serious and permanent necessities of the three republics. Our confidence in the noble action of the United States was strengthened above all when we heard his excellency Mr. Osborn, as organ of his colleagues and appreciating exactly one point in our history, declare in these words, "That for the first time the institutions of our continent were on trial."

Notwithstanding that the propositions of Chili when presented were of such a character as to shut off all discussion, we endeavored to maintain it patiently in the limits of natural development.

Consequently we introduced for the sake of peace and the high interests of America what we thought a measure of conciliation, counting upon the approbation of our government. Its sense and deductions, as well as the substance of our observations, are contained in the proper protocol. We will only add that their excellencies the plenipotentiaries of Chili declared this measure inconvenient and opposed to their instructions.

We favored decidedly the arbitration proposed by their excellencies the ministers of Peru, and did not omit to show all the advantages held out by this means even to the Republic of Chili.

Nothing was sufficient to change the unalterable resolution maintained by their excellencies the plenipotentiaries of Chili in regard to the definite annexation of all the Bolivian coast, and that of Peru as far as Camorones, as a basis sine qua non of any arrangement.

With satisfaction we have to refer to the distinguished attitude of their excellencies the plenipotentiaries of Peru in discharging their delicate and difficult task, wherein they were assisted materially by their clear and practical reasoning.

We also express our acknowledgments of the personal efforts of their excellencies the ministers of the United States, and we are well aware of what we owe to those particularly employed by his excellency Mr. Charles Adams; but, considering the antecedents of the mediation and the high object manifested in the first conference, we cannot conceal our lively regrets that it was not possible for the most excellent mediators to assume a different diplomatic attitude from that which his excellency Mr. Osborn marked out, and which reduced itself to a polite invitation to meet and preside over our discussions, without giving their presence any other character than that of the most simple and initiatory good offices.

Our efforts to re-establish an honorable and secure peace between the three republics have been without result. Arbitration, the most dignified mode of settling disputes among civilized nations, has been rejected. America will decide on which side justice remains.

Begging you to bring this report, with the protocols attached, to the knowledge of the President of the Republic, we herewith tender our respects and subscribe ourselves.

Your very, &c.,

MARIANO BAPTISTA.

No. 49.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
La Paz, December 3, 1880. (Received January 21, 1881.)

SIR: Since the publication in pamphlet form of the protocols of the Arica conferences, one of which, with the report of the Bolivian plenipotentiaries, I had the honor to transmit in my dispatch No. 46, another document relating to the same subject has been issued by the department of foreign affairs, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, in which Mr. Carrillo recites all the steps taken by him in regard to the mediation, and finally closes by offering his resignation on account of its failure. The manifest, as it is called, is quite lengthy, and as all the points are well known to you from my former dispatches, and the annexed correspondence with the memoranda of official interviews have all been transmitted by me, a complete translation seems unnecessary.

Mr. Carrillo begins by saying that as soon as the mediation had been offered he had, full of hopes of a successful issue, communicated these to the National Congress, which had approved of the policy to be pursued; and now, inasmuch as it had failed, he felt himself obliged to show to the country the reasons whereupon his hopes and policy were based. He then gives in detail the history of our correspondence from its commencement of our two interviews, and lays particular stress upon the idea advanced by me that if the representatives of the three republics could not agree, it seemed to me advisable that the settlement should be left to arbitration; at any rate that the different plenipotentiaries ought to have full power to accept arbitration if mediation failed, especially as this had been offered, not as a compliment, but actually with a view to end the conflict. He then proceeds to give his correspondence with his minister in Lima; refers to the offered mediation of the European powers, and states his reasons why the latter could not be accepted. He then briefly mentions that the expedition to and destruction of private property at Chimbote had nearly frustrated all hopes of the conferences taking place, but that finally, all obstacles being removed, the actual meeting seemed to hold out a hope of a successful issue.

Passing to the conferences, she ascribes the failure of the mediation to the determined and not-to-be-modified proposition of Chili to annex the Bolivian and Peruvian coast provinces by right of conquest simply, and leaves it to America and the world to judge whether this demand of Chili and the acknowldgement of being conquered by Peru and Bolivia would be consistent with the honor of the latter and with American interests at large.

He then calls attention to the curious history of this mediation, which was first accepted by Chili in August last, then even its existence denied by its cabinet, then again officially accepted on October 7, although my correspondence, as well as the fact that the day for the conference was fixed by Mr. Christiancy and Mr. Osborn for the 5th of October, borne out by the further fact that the Chilian admiral actually permitted the Peruvian vessel with the plenipotentiaries on board to leave Callao on the 1st of the same month, would demonstrate that the second acceptance was an act hardly in accordance with the honor of an American nation. Then, speaking of the attitude of the American ministers and the course pursued by us, he continues:

The spirit of conciliation consistent with the good offices of a mediating power has never entered into the designs of Chili. Arbitration proposed with full acknowledgment of the advantages gained in the war was hotly rejected. All discussion, all agreement was impossible. The mediation, the diplomatic action of the allied governments, and the universal wish for the return of peace, I repeat, were doomed by the determined attitude of the representatives of Chili.

In such extreme emergency what action would have been most consistent with the dignity of the most excellent ministers of the United States and the high prestige of its government?

With perfect right and in accordance with the first step in the mediation they might have proposed acceptable bases, or they might have approved the propositions of the plenipotentiaries of the allies, if they considered these just and proper. They might have advised, and even honored with their decided approval, the acceptance of arbitration, which, considered in the Bolivian ministry as the essential basis of mediation and frankly authorized by the representative of the United States was the only possible solution since the beginning of the negotiations. This, and much more, and on a greater scale, corresponded with the noble and fervent desires with which the most excellent Government of the United States proposed to aid in the restoration of peace.

But this important step, which might have been taken by the representatives of the United States, preceded those haughty and determined declarations as well as the protest that under no considerations would these be changed; and they, convinced also that the sentiment of Chili was for war at any price, preferred to reserve their diplomatic action in order to avoid a sure rejection of their proposition and the grave consequences which might have followed such action. Without instructions towards such extreme eventuality they were obliged to limit their action to bringing the unexpected and unsuccessful conclusion of the offered mediation to the knowledge of their government. So by this step, prudent as well as of great foresight, they have preserved the prestige of the government of the Great Republic and the respect due its policy of conciliation.

Mr. Carrillo then gives it as his opinion that the Government of Chili at first was prepared to offer moderate conditions, but that under the influence of public clamor it had abandoned the path of justice, and thereby, perhaps, endangered its political future, and he concludes by offering, as stated above, his resignation because the policy advocated by him before the Congress and the country had failed.

It may not be out of place, nor uninteresting to add, that so far this resignation has not been accepted, nor is it likely to be, as the press and people, as far as heard from, are united in declaring the action of Señor Carrillo to have been upright and statesmanlike, and President Campero last night informed me that, unless public sentiment in the interior should be different, Mr. Carrillo would certainly remain at the head of affairs.

At the same time I was also informed that Mr. Baptista, the other plenipotentiary at Arica, and Mr. Aramayo, the secretary, had been appointed minister and secretary of legation at Buenos Ayres, so that it seems that instead of being considered a failure, the Bolivian diplomats engaged in the negotiations are rewarded, their action and position are fully approved, and the result is considered an advantage, because it is hoped by some that the so openly exposed policy of conquest on the part of Chili, coupled with the rejection of arbitration, may induce our government to intervene; while, on the other hand, there is no doubt that it will compel the Government of the Argentine Republic, which also has its frontier disputes with Chili, to demand guarantees for its own security, in which case it is expected here that war between those two powers will be unavoidable.

No. 24.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 14, 1880.

SIR: You dispatch No. 36, of the 24th of October last, written while on board of the United States ship Lackawanna, Bay of Arica, has been received. It narrates the personal movements of yourself and the Bolivian plenipotentiaries to join the conference, under the mediation of the United States, between the belligerent powers.

Your action, as reported therein, is approved by the Department.

While upon the subject of the mediation between the plenipotentiaries of Bolivia, Chili, and Peru, I have to inform you that Mr. Christiancy has, in his dispatch No. 200, of the 2d ultimo, inclosed the protocols of the conferences of such representatives, held at Arica from the 22d to the 27th of October last.

Although this government would have been glad to have received intelligence that its efforts in the direction of securing peace between the belligerent powers had been efficacious to that desirable end, and although it cannot cease to entertain the most serious regret that such efforts have met with so little apparent success thus far, the Government of the United States still stands ready to render its assistance to that end in every proper way.

No. 52.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
La Paz, December 16, 1880. (Received February 5, 1881.)

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a diplomatic circular addressed to the governments of South America by the minister of foreign relations of Bolivia, and which, in connection with his manifest, a copy of which has heretofore been transmitted, is intended to fully demonstrate the position of Bolivia in the present war, the unjust demands and cruel mode of warfare on the part of Chili, and seems to have in view an active intervention of the other South American states as against the encroachments on the part of Chili.

Much of what is contained in this circular is a repetition of former declarations, especially as to the policy of Chili, now openly acknowledged to be one of conquest, and which Mr. Carrillo thinks, if accepted in silence and without protest by the other governments of South America, would, after what has happened at Arica, place these in a position of virtually acknowledging it to be proper and right.

The principal reasons for invoking the intervention of the other States against Chili are its policy of conquest, contrary to American ideas, traditions, and interests; the cruel mode of prosecuting the war by destruction of private property and undefended towns; and, principally, the rejection of the proposed arbitration.

If the first should be accepted as the future policy of America, Mr. Carrillo explains, all the different republics would be obliged to keep large standing armies, which heretofore had never been necessary, and constant wars might be apprehended.

Chili had never pretended to claim any part of the territory now demanded as the price of peace; while even when the small Republic of Paraguay, after a long war, and completely at the mercy of its enemies—the powerful Empire of Brazil and the Argentine Confederation—it was especially declared that the victory did not give them title to disputed territory, but the decision on that point was left to the President of the United States as arbiter; and in accordance with it the Argentine Republic returned to Paraguay, territory to which it had claimed and believed to have rights, and Brazil kept only such as it fully was entitled to.

The coast district of Bolivia, small as it is, had given it an outlet to the Pacific Ocean, and its possession was never questioned until natural deposits of salitre and guano were discovered, and should it now be taken, its only outlet would be gone, and thereby its very existence and certainly the equilibrium of South America be threatened.

Passing to the second consideration, the various acts of devastation in the present war are enumerated and compared to the policy of England during our own war of 1812–'14, when Admiral Cochrane destroyed our undefended towns on the Atlantic and even the public buildings of our capital, for which action he had not only been denounced in his own country, but all over the civilized world, and which like action, in addition to what already has been done, is now threatened against Lima, the old and historical city of the Pacific, destruction of which has been authorized by Chili.

The third consideration, the rejection of arbitration by Chili, is especially commented upon, because a month before the conference at Arica it had entered into a treaty with the Republic of Colombia on the following terms:

Desiring to affirm the sentiments of international friendship which should be the foundation of peace and fraternity in America, they have, with this object in view, resolved to make a treaty and have signed the following articles:

First. The two republics are forever obliged to submit to arbitration all controversies and difficulties of whatever nature may come up between both nations.

Second. In case of failure to agree, the President of the United States of America is fully authorized as arbiter to carry out his functions as such.

Third. Colombia and Chili shall try, at the first opportunity, to hold like conventions with the other American nations, so that the solution of all international conflicts by means of arbitration be a principle of American public right.

A month after this had been signed the very principle was disowned, one entirely contrary to its protestations proposed, and the very power which so solemnly had been designated as arbiter by Chili itself as solemnly rejected.

Mr. Carrillo, in summing up, refers also to the other conditions imposed upon the allies, which virtually deprive them of their sovereignty, as it prohibits them from entering into future treaties, besides declaring null and void a former one, and forbids Peru even to fortify its own ports in the future; thereby assuming such domination as no nation could submit to if not totally conquered. Mr. Carrillo, therefore, believes that the governments of the other republics, convinced of Chili's bad faith, barbarous acts and intentions, its false position, lust of conquest and domination, will in their wisdom take such steps as will stop these ambitions, preserve the traditions of America, and define such a policy for the future which, in accord with the division of Spanish-America, and the definition of the limits of the different republics as agreed upon in 1810, will forever avoid further complications and conflicts; to which end he advises that an American congress should meet, deliberate upon all questions at issue, and establish such guarantees as will keep intact these limits, and in that way procure a lasting peace. On account of a severe illness, from which I still suffer, and having no assistance whatever, I have not been able to make a translation of the circular, but trust that the above summary may answer the purpose.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a second diplomatic circular,* addressed by Mr. Carrillo to the other American governments, relating to the present war with Chili, and which is especially intended as an answer to and in refutation of the position assumed by the minister for foreign affairs of Chili, as expressed in his diplomatic circular of November 10, 1880, a copy of which has no doubt reached the Department.

The charges contained in the latter circular as against Bolivia, "that she has failed to comply with the provisions of former treaties, that she had rejected arbitration, and that she had entered into the 1873 treaty with Peru with hostile intent towards Chili," are seriatim considered in this paper, and the whole question is carried back to the outbreak of the war and the causes leading to it, which, from a Bolivian standpoint, are shown to be for a long time entertained and premeditated by Chili in order to conquer and utilize the rich coast districts belonging to Bolivia.

No. 57.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
La Paz, January 17, 1881. (Received March 2.)

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 15th instant the Carrillo cabinet, whose probable dissolution after the failure of the Arica conferences was foreshadowed, went quietly out of office, and a new cabinet was announced, which consists of Dr. Nuñez del Prado, minister of government and public instruction; Señor Villazon, for treasury (retained); Dr. Aguirro for war, and Dr. Jiménez for foreign affairs and public worship. The latter, at present prefect of the province of Cochabamba, has as yet not arrived at La Paz, so that Dr. Nuñez del Prado is charged also with the business of the foreign department for the time being.

This cabinet may be considered representing the extreme war party, as Dr. Aguirro will be the soul of it, who, as a member of the late Congress, was daily and hourly advocating fresh measures for resistance and aggression, and has ever been opposed to President Campero's policy of inaction and expectancy.

While Chilian cannon are thundering at the very doors of Lima, and all Bolivia is trembling for its fate and praying for its deliverance, this change of cabinet takes place, and with it a ray of hope comes from the south, from the government of the Argentine Republic, which at last has granted free transit for Bolivian arms and ammunition, and should the anticipated capture of Lima be delayed, Chili may find in a short time a Bolivian army in its rear occupying Tacna, Arica, and Iquique, which might force it to abandon its plans regarding Lima, and to fight again for the possession of Atacama and Tarapaca, which provinces it has already fondly considered its own by right of possession and conquest. I am also informed by the Peruvian minister that the government at Buenos Ayres has decisively declared its intention to oppose any annexation of territory in South America, and its press and public opinion have lately assumed such bitter hostility towards Chili, that even before you receive this the latter may have considered it wiser to abandon its position.

This city, although rumors of revolution are frequently circulating, remains quiet. The other day a plot of mutiny was discovered amongst the soldiers, and a sergeant promptly shot, and the editor of La Patria, who advocated peace with Chili at the expense of Peru, might have shared the same fate if he had not been granted asylum in the Brazilian legation, but had to leave the republic within twenty-four hours, which measures seem to have established General Campero only the firmer in his seat, so that I do not expect any serious attempts against him, unless events now taking place near Lima should deprive Dictator Piérola of power, and in sympathy should also affect Bolivia. * * *

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 57, of the 17th ultimo, I have the honor to report that Dr. Nuñez del Prado, of whose appointment as minister for foreign affairs ad interim I had advised you, has now entered upon the duties of that office in the full character. * * *

The news of the defeat of Dictator Piérola, of Peru, before Lima, and the capture of that city, at first discredited but within the last days fully confirmed, has so demoralized all classes and parties that opinions as to the probable consequences here are as yet simply speculative, and must remain so until the course of Peru in its defeat, and that of victorious Chili, develops itself.

The foreigners here not represented by ministers, or consuls even, are in the greatest terror since it has become known that Lima would have been pillaged and plundered only for the energetic action of the diplomatic corps, backed by a powerful fleet; and they fear that, if a Chilian force should approach La Paz and the government be compelled to abandon the city, not only the soldiers of the enemy, but also the lower classes of the population here might commit excesses, directed of course mainly against the property and persons of foreigners.

Should this eventuality occur, I hope to be able to save life and property in exerting myself to bring about a peaceful occupation of the city by the enemy, and in organizing an armed city guard of the foreign residents, in imitation of the course taken at Lima.

Allow me to add that I still remain without mail of any kind from the United States.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a diplomatic circular from the Bolivian minister of foreign affairs, issued under date of February 1, with translation, in which the position of Bolivia is defined as influenced by the late defeat before Lima.

I do not think it necessary to add any opinion of mine regarding this circular and the very strong views of the Bolivian Government therein expressed, as it quite corresponds with what I have foreshadowed in former dispatches. I may, however, say that although Bolivia is apparently exhausted and looked upon by Chili as an enemy not worth troubling herself about, it may carry on for an indefinite period a guerrilla warfare, which will be a continuous menace to Chili, and well calculated to threaten its peaceful possession of the conquered territory, necessitating the support of a large standing army, while at the same time it will no doubt turn Bolivia's commerce toward the Atlantic, via the La Plata or Amazon River. At any rate, I consider Bolivia stronger to-day than Peru, as it has more means of resistance and a more united people, and has suffered less in the actual war.

The original document, addressed to the minister of Bolivia at Washington, I beg to inclose for transmittal to its address, as requested in the accompanying note of the Hon. Dr. Nuñez del Prado, and have the honor to be, &c.,

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the correspondence which has taken place between some Spanish subjects residing in La Paz and myself, upon the question of a war-tax levied upon the people of Bolivia by the late Congress and now about to be enforced.

You will perceive that I have refused to accommodate these gentlemen, for aside from the consideration that the request for my official interference should have come from the Spanish Government directly, or its minister at Lima, I consider the tax referred to not one of an extraordinary character as implied by the treaty mentioned in the petition, as it was decreed by a Congress and imposed upon all inhabitants of the republic in proportion to their property.

A question of this kind upon application of American citizens residing in Mexico was at the time decided by the then minister, Mr. Corwin, in the same spirit, and his action was approved by the Department, so that although my reply to this—a test petition, which was to have been followed by others—has obviated all further resistance on the part of other foreigners. I feel that in advising Americans, even, to pay, I have acted properly and in accordance with international comity.

To his Excellency General CHARLES ADAMS,
Minister Resident of the United States of America, present:

Mr. MINISTER: We, the undersigned, Spanish subjects resident in this city, see ourselves obliged to trouble your excellency and to request your assistance towards a petition, which we are compelled to direct to the supreme government of this republic, which petition, praying for an exemption from the extraordinary contribution now actually demanded from Bolivian citizens, is attached to this note.

We request your protection, most excellent sir, on account of the known absence of a diplomatic representative of His Majesty the King of Spain to a simple consular agent in all the territory of the republic, in which case the international practice of civilized nations authorizes us to have recourse to the representative of a nation friendly to our own, who cannot refuse to assist us if he is convinced of the justice of the reclamation.

In the present case your excellency will perceive that our request cannot be more just, and the minister of the United States, a nation so friendly to Spain, cannot do less than accede to our demand.

Your excellency will, therefore, be kind enough to present our petition to the supreme government near which you are worthily accredited, and to duly favor the same, being assured that by so doing you will not only earn our gratitude, but also, as may be imagined, that of the Government of His Catholic Majesty.

With this motive we have the high honor to subscribe ourselves your excellency's obedient and respectful servants,

Mr. PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC: Asking a declaration of exemption of what they mention, founded on the international laws they quote:

The undersigned, Spanish subjects resident in this city, through the organ of the minister for foreign affairs, and by the mediation of the minister resident of the United States of America, not having a diplomatic or consular agent of their own nation, most respectfully submit to your consideration:

That the supreme Government of Bolivia, making use of its legitimate authority, has ordered the carrying out of a law of the late national convention, by which an extraordinary forced war contribution was ordered to be levied, assessed equitably and proportionately.

That for this purpose and in this department of La Paz, in which we are residents, a commission of most honorable and competent persons has been appointed to assign to each citizen the quota he has to pay according to the judgment of said commission.

That in the distribution of the said forced war contribution and its assessment, not only the inhabitants of this city, without distinction or exemption whatever, have been included, but also the foreigners; as the said honorable commission has not weighed the powerful and imprescriptible exemptions established as a general rule in favor of foreigners by international law, and fixed especially in our behalf by solemn international treaties in full force to-day between Bolivia and Spain.

On this account we are obliged to address ourselves to the justification of the government of the republic, asking a declaration of exemption from all extraordinary war loans or taxes, on account of our being Spanish subjects, protected not only by international law, but by the formal engagements of this nation towards ours.

The legal reasons on which we base our claim are obvious, and fearing to offend the recognized knowledge and integrity of the government of the republic; we will briefly and summarily mention just only in order to bring them to mind.

By the treaty made between this republic and His Majesty the King of Spain, at Paris, on the 29th of August, 1879, ratified and exchanged in the same city on January 19, 1880, and promulgated as a law of the republic in this city of La Paz on the 30th of August last (third article), are re-established in full force the stipulations of the treaty made between the said nations on February 12, 1861. The eleventh article of said treaty says literally: "Neither Bolivians in Spain, nor Spaniards in Bolivia, are obliged to serve in the army, navy, or militia, and they are exempt from all extraordinary impost tax or loan, and in the ordinary taxes which they pay on account of their industry, commerce, or landed property, they must be treated just as the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation." One cannot find a more clear, peremptory, and reciprocal exemption in favor of the citizens of both states, living in each other's territory, and which involves their exemption from all forced or extraordinary taxes (of war) in strict compliance with the doctrines of international law.

And even if this positive law referred to did not exist—a law that, like all international treaty law, is supreme and modifies even the constitution of the state—it is enough to legitimate our claim by stating that the practical jurisprudence of all civilized nations and the doctrine established by all the authorities on the subject are all in our favor.

There is no need to quote Vattel, Pradier, Forderé, Fioré, Jenner, Block, Bello, and so many other eminent writers, who unanimously sustain this doctrine; but we will refer to all the treaties of amity and commerce in force to-day between different nations, all of which establish the doctrines of exemption with rigorous uniformity.

To insist on this would be tiresome and superfluous. We are sure that the government has had no doubt about it, and that, taking duly into account our petition, the government will modify the proceedings of the assessing commission, and that it will proclaim a doctrine which is a law of the nation and attested by a sacred agreement, by declaring that the subjects of His Majesty the King of Spain are not obliged to pay now, and are not subject to any other tax of the kind, either of blood, money, or otherwise.

We expect our petition will be duly and justly appreciated, and granted as it is founded on justice.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Cotaña, February 18, 1881.

Messrs. SARAIZABEL, DAVIN, MALDONALDO, and others, subjects of Spain in La Paz, Bolivia:

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 11th instant, in which you ask me to transmit to the Government of Boliva, in an official manner, a document signed by the Spanish subjects of La Paz, praying for an exemption from the forced loan lately decreed, and in which you ask my help and protection, basing your request upon the fact that Spain has no representative of its own near the Government of Bolivia, and that you feel yourselves authorized by common international usage to call upon me as the representative of a friendly nation.

In reply to your polite and dignified letter, I am sorry to be obliged to inform you that I cannot comply with your request, inasmuch, by the established usage of nations, and in compliance with the rules made for the ministers of the United States by its government, it is required that the request for diplomatic protection of subjects of another country by any minister of the United States should come from the government of such country, and should be acknowledged by the government where both reside.

In cases where the life, liberty, or property of a foreign subject or citizen, not represented, has been in danger either from local persecution or foreign invasion, it has been customary for such foreigner to claim the help and protection of the representative of a friendly nation, and, without a previous request from his own government and the usual formalties, it has been accorded freely and fully, especially by ministers of the United States, at different times and occasions; but this case, involving as it does no act of persecution or injustice even, but simply the rights and duties of foreigners under established treaty stipulations, into a discussion of which I am not prepared to enter, offers no reason for my official interference, especially as I cannot deny that a sovereign nation has the right, even in time of war, to levy extraordinary taxes, not upon the person, but the property and business of its inhabitants, and as long as no distinction is made in the assessment of this tax—called strangely, for what reason I know not, a forced loan (emprestito forzoso), although legally authorized by a constitutional Congress of the republic—I do not feel warranted in throwing obstacles in the way of the government, and did and shall advise my own countrymen to pay the said tax.

I have the honor, in returning to you, gentlemen, the document referred to, to assure you of my highest respect and consideration, and to subscribe myself,

Your very obedient servant,

CHARLES ADAMS.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Blaine.

No. 75.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
La Paz, June 8, 1881. (Received July 18.)

SIR: Regarding the political situation of Bolivia, I have the honor to report that everything remains in statu quo. The Congress of the country has been called to meet in extra session on the 13th of this month, but it is simply expected to approve the measures of the government since its adjournment last November. President Campero seems to be established firmer in his seat than ever, and his policy of quietly strengthening the army, drilling and equipping it, and of getting the national guard ready for active service, if necessary, seems to meet the approval of the country, based as this policy is upon the expressed will of the people to resist any invasion Chili might contemplate.

Meanwhile, the visit of President Piérola to La Paz has strengthened the alliance between Peru and Bolivia, and I do not believe that one will make peace without the co-operation and approval of the other. Nobody here so far acknowledges the government of García Calderon at Lima while it is upheld by Chilian bayonets. While an invasion from Chili in the near future is entirely improbable, as Chilian soldiers could never endure an Andean winter, and so no immediate fighting is expected, it is still hoped here that our government may be pleased to put an end to the war, and in the interest of commerce, humanity, republican institutions, and American traditions and ideas may compel Chili, if necessary, to grant to Peru and Bolivia honorable terms of peace, instead of holding both countries by the throat, so to speak, by demanding continuous contributions and excluding them from all commerce on the sea. * * *

I have, &c.,

CHARLES ADAMS.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF BOLIVIA,
La Paz, February 1, 1881. (Received May 10.)

SIR: This ministry has the honor to inform your excellency's government of Bolivia's unshaken determination to defend her rights and to repel the doctrines of absorption and conquest which are sustained by Chili.

This attitude, which is the only one that my government considers compatible with the dignity and lawful privileges of an American nation, is in accordance with the conviction which it entertains, that the vast proportions which the war on the Pacific is daily assuming affect not only the territorial integrity of the allied nations, but even their future autonomy and the permanent interests of America in a serious manner.

In order to defend this idea, Bolivia has sacrificed her bravest sons, and is anxiously waiting for every American country to protest against the acts of that nation which has originated this sanguinary conflict.

Meanwhile the allied forces, whose arms have been attended with very ill success during the course of the struggle, have just met with another reverse near Lima.

The loss of that maritime city, and the total destruction of the allied fleet, oblige the government of the undersigned once more solemnly to declare to the friendly nations of this continent that it is resolved unflinchingly to persevere in the defense of its autonomic integrity and in that of American interests.

The occupation of Lima, far from shaking the determination of this republic, has stimulated its patriotism, and it is now prepared to continue the struggle with Chili at any sacrifice.

This resolution is strengthened by the remembrance of an act which will be condemned by all America. The war, which was inaugurated by the forcible occupation of the maritime districts of Bolivia, is not a dispute concerning a right that is more or less doubtful among the belligerent powers; it is one for the settlement of serious and highly important questions. Chili, confiding in the strength of her navy, hoists the standard of conquest and of territorial annexation. Bolivia and Peru reject these doctrines and offer their blood and treasure in behalf of the triumph of the principle of right.

There is, then, an immense chasm between the objects aimed at by the two contending parties; and peace with Chili, which is at the present moment impossible, cannot be restored save by the absolute triumph of the one and the utter overthrow of the other.

The justice of the cause which Bolivia is defending is in itself a powerful stimulus to maintain the contest, and the cheering conviction which she entertains, viz, that in sacrificing herself in her own defense she is sacrificing herself for the great interests of America, increases her warlike enthusiasm and adds fuel to the flame of her patriotism.

My government feels persuaded that by resolutely accepting this situation it furnishes evidence of its good faith towards its ally and of its devotion to the principles which it professes.

If the final result shall be unfavorable to her, Bolivia will have the glory of having sacrificed herself in defense of her rights in preference to accepting the galling yoke of the conqueror.

Such, most excellent sir, are the declarations which my government desires to make to friendly nations, inasmuch as they are watching with increasing interest the prolonged struggle on the Pacific coast, and as for the continuance of that struggle it relies upon the favorable opinion of your excellency's enlightened government.

This occasion affords to the undersigned, minister of foreign relations of Bolivia, the high honor of offering your excellency the assurances of the esteem and respect with which he subscribes himself,

Your excellency's obedient servant,

DANIEL NUÑEZ DEL PRADO.

of the United States of North America, Washington.

LEGATION OF BOLIVIA IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 18, 1881. (Received February 19.)

SIR: In reference to the subject which I had the honor to broach to your excellency, in the name of my government, on the 3d instant—the conference which you were pleased to accord to me, at my request, having then remained pending—I take pleasure in laying before your excellency's government the latest intelligence that I have received from the Pacific touching the war subsequently to the occupation of Lima by the Chilian army.

According to this intelligence the government of Peru had retired to the departments of the south. Mr. Pierola, the president, having declared that the seat of government is where the executive is, Mr. Aurelio Garcia y Garcia had been appointed secretary-general.

The government of Peru, on taking its departure for the department of Arequipa, was firmly purposed to continue the war to the utmost extremity. This information is contained in a telegram which has been received by Mr. Ramon I. Garcia, chargé d'affaires of Peru near your excellency's government.

General Baquedano, moreover, who is in command of the Chilian forces which have occupied Lima, had addressed an official communication to the municipal government of the capital of Peru, apprising it of the necessity of forming a board composed of the principal citizens, that it might designate a provisional government with which an armistice might be concluded or some other arrangement made. The municipal government had replied that, inasmuch as President Pierola's government was still existing and had received its powers from the nation, no municipal government or board of principal citizens could arrogate to itself the right to appoint another government.

General Baquedano had likewise addressed a communication to the supreme court of Peru, requesting it to re-enter upon the discharge of its functions, but the court had replied declining to do so.

As to Bolivia, it is known that her army was to march against Tacna under the command of General Campero, the president of the republic, and in concert with a portion of the army of Arequipa, on the 15th of last month.

It was also known that she had received a supply of arms, and expected to receive more, through a reliable channel.

All this shows that the occupation of Lima has not ended the war, and that, so far from this being the case, the governments of Peru and Bolivia will continue it with greater activity than ever.

Nevertheless, some solution must be sought that will put an end to the present state of things, and I firmly believe that, an earnest desire existing to secure an honorable peace, and one that will meet all present as well as all future requirements of the belligerent nations, some combination acceptable to all parties is not impossible.

To this effect I beg leave to offer the plan contained in the documents numbered 1 and 2, and herewith inclosed, to the consideration of your excellency's government.

This plan, if carried out, would, in my judgment, meet all the difficulties that have given rise to the war, they being simply the wealth of Peru and Bolivia.

It would systematize the working and management of that wealth in the interest of universal commerce; in the interest of the markets which purchase guano and saltpeter; in the interest of the owners of the territory containing these valuable substances, and in the interest of modern civilization, which loves peace and detests war.

In a political point of view it would prescribe the right of conquest; and as regards the stability of the South American nations, it would firmly establish the uti possidetis principle, which is the foundation of their nationality and independence.

Moreover, with regard to the manner in which the guano and saltpeter deposits of Peru and Bolivia have hitherto been worked by European capital, long years of experience have shown that there is need of a new element, capable of giving renewed vigor and a different form to the industry and commerce of those republics.

With the most respectful and cordial sentiments, I am, &c.,

LADISLAO CABRERA.

PLAN.

1st. The organization of a company in the United States is suggested, for the purpose of working the guano and nitrate deposits of Peru and Bolivia, the company to consist of powerful capitalists, and the effective capital and organization to meet the approval of the Governments of Chili, Peru, and Bolivia.

2d. The three governments to turn over to the company, for the period of ——— years, the entire and exclusive control and administration of the districts claimed by Chili by right of conquest, as well as any guano deposits not so claimed, and to guarantee their pacific occupation by the company.

3d. The United States Government to guarantee that the company shall remain in peaceable and undisturbed possession and administration of the districts to be designated in the contract.

4th. From the proceeds of the working of the guano and nitrate deposits, the company to retain such amounts as may be indicated in the contract, and to apply the remainder in such proportions as Chili, Peru, and Bolivia may arrange by treaty—

First. To the war indemnity which may be agreed upon.

Second. To the payment of nitrate certificates.

Third. To the existing foreign loans of Peru.

Fourth. To the Peruvian Government.

Fifth. To the Bolivian Government.

5th. The company is to establish its own agencies in the various markets of the world, conduct and manage all sales of the guano and nitrate, and manipulate both products within limits to be agreed upon; but the entire operations of the company shall be subject to periodical report and inspection.

6th. The contract company to have authority to capitalize, in the form of a public loan, the war idemnity and the nitrate certificates; and, if it be found convenient by the company, the Peruvian loans of 1870 and 1872 may be included in a single consolidated issue; the rate of interest, sinking fund, issue-price, commission, &c., to be agreed upon in consultation with the three governments.

Should a loan be negotiated, Chili to be paid the full war indemnity at once, and to release all claim and charges upon the guano and nitrate deposits and districts of both Peru and Bolivia held by the company, but not to retire her obligation guaranteeing the pacific occupation by the company of the districts confided to its administration.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF BOLIVIA IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, May 9, 1881. (Received May 9.)

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: In the month of February last I had the honor to have a verbal conference with Mr. Evarts, then Secretary of State, with regard to the urgent necessity of putting an end to the long and disastrous war between Peru, Bolivia, and Chili.

For the purpose of reaching some practical result, I proposed, after some preliminaries, the bases of a peace contained in my note of February 18th, and the two inclosures therewith transmitted.

His excellency, Mr. Evarts, although he considered the plan submitted to his consideration as possessing a high degree of importance, had not time to give it the necessary attention, owing to the change in the administration of the United States Government, as he had the kindness to state in his note of March 5.

I duly reported what had been done to the governments of Bolivia and Peru, calling their attention at the same time to the necessity of proposing those bases of a peace to Chili as their ultimatum.

Since that date the character of the war has not changed much, notwithstanding the occupation of Lima by the victorious forces of Chili. In the south and north of Peru resistance is still continued, and in Bolivia public spirit has been invigorated by the news of the occupation of Lima, all of which renders it probable that the war will be interminable.

This view is confirmed by a telegram which was published by the New York Herald in its issue of the 6th, in which it was stated that the King of Holland had authorized his representative to tender his (the King's) good offices, in conjunction with France, England, and Italy, to the three belligerent nations for the restoration of peace.

I cannot believe, under these circumstances, that your excellency's government, which during the course of this war has manifested so deep an interest in the restoration of peace among the nations of South America, will permit foreign powers to claim the merit of having restored peace, while the plan which I had the honor to propose is still pending before it. In presenting that plan my object was manifold, viz, to bring about an honorable peace; to strengthen and develop the wonderful productive power of North America by opening new and profitable markets to its commercial activity; to secure to your excellency's government that influence in South America which rightfully belongs to it by reason of its proximity, its civilization, and the similarity of its institutions; and, finally, to satisfy the pecuniary demands of Chili, the conqueror of Lima.

In order to secure such great benefits to humanity, to whom war must ever be repugnant; to bring two continents of the New World into immediate contact by closely uniting them in the bonds of industry and commerce; and, finally, to secure even the rights of the conqueror (although they are improperly so called), what is it that the plan proposed by me asks of your excellency's government?

Nothing but the fulfillment of an obligation, which is to be common to all the governments, viz, to guarantee that capital invested by citizens of the United States in the management and working of the guano and nitre deposits of Peru and Bolivia shall not be disturbed in its industrial application.

I take the liberty to submit these passing reflections to your excellency, that they may receive attention when you may see fit to consider my plan, and to secure a new title to glory to your government by restoring peace in South America, and by opening up new sources of wealth to North American labor and activity.

I purposely avoid presenting any further considerations, but I feel sure that the foregoing will not be disregarded by your excellency.

With sentiments of true respect and high esteem, I am your excellency's obedient servant,

LADISLAO CABRERA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 14, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of February 1 last, setting forth the reasons which animate and control the Government of Bolivia in resisting to the last extremity the encroachments of the Chilian Government.

The people of this country have watched, not without the deepest interest, the continued struggle between the three nations on the Pacific, whose institutions and forms of government are allied to their own, in the sincere hope that the differences of whatever nature which engendered the present conflict might be amicably and satisfactorily adjusted, and the perpetuity and prosperity of those republics guaranteed.

Still cherishing this confident hope, I bid you accept, sir in the name of the Government and people of the United States the assurances of my highest consideration.

President Hayes to the Emperor of Brazil.

Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, to His Majesty Dom Pedro I, Constitutional Emperor and Perpetual Defender of Brazil:

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: I have received intelligence from the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States in Brazil of the nomination by your Imperial Majesty of the Councillor, Baron de Arinos, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Your Majesty at Brussels, as the third commissioner, provided for by the text of the convention concerning claims, entered into on the 15th of January last between the United States and France.

The Government of the United States fully appreciates the courtesy of Your Majesty in acceding to the invitation respecting this appointment, and will be peculiarly gratified to welcome to the scene of his labors a gentleman already distinguished by the regard of Your Majesty.

May God have Your Majesty in His wise keeping.

Written at Washington the 9th day of November, in the year 1880, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and fifth.

Your good friend,

Mr. Hilliard to Mr. Evarts.

No. 198.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, December 6, 1880. (Received December 30.)

SIR: The session of the Parliament of Brazil is drawing towards its close.

The senate has been for some time almost exclusively engaged in considering the new electoral reform bill, a measure of great importance. Several articles have already been agreed to, among them one which removes the disabilities of naturalized Brazilians and non-Catholic subjects, and makes them for the first time eligible to office under the imperial government.

It is believed that the bill will be finally adopted by a small majority. This is a great step in the right direction, and when the measure becomes a law it will greatly advance the prosperity of the country.

Another subject has engaged the attention of the senate; the relations between Brazil and the Argentine Republic. A few days since Senator Silvria Martens, ex-minister of finance, addressed the senate on the subject, and referred to the threatening armament of the Argentine Republic. He said:

> There is something which to me is worth more than direct election, than internal improvements, than party, more than all else; it is the existence of our country, the integrity of its territory. We have a neighbor who is now armed to the teeth. The Argentine Republic has accumulated an immense supply of war material, and the President who has just retired from power boasts in articles attributed to him that he has made his country the first military power in South America. In their arsenal they have 80,000 Remington rifles; they are just now receiving eleven Krupp batteries; they have a squadron of iron-clad torpedo boats, and in three months can arm 100,000 men, at which I do not wonder, as they receive thousands of immigrants every month to whom, in emergencies, and without making a question of religion or nationality, as with ourselves, are intrusted banners and arms for defending their new country.
> At their front to-day is found a youthful President, a distinguished general flushed by the victories won in civil war, but ambitious of the military glory which can only be found in an international war in the name of the country, and not in that of a faction.

He proceeded to say that it was the purpose of the Argentine Republic to annex Paraguay and Uruguay, which would of course involve Brazil in war, as Brazil is obliged by treaties to maintain the independence of those two countries.

Mr. Saraiva, the prime minister, replied in moderate terms, admitting that Brazil had been for some time dominated by the desire, almost exclusively, to develop the material growth of the empire, and to make economies that should establish an equilibrium in the budgets without prejudice to the improvements already begun. He proceeded to say that the material of the navy would be renewed, and attention given to increasing the army. He added that he hoped peace would be maintained with the Argentine Republic, as there were no questions which could disturb the relations between the two countries, and that the armaments of the Argentine Republic could be explained by the exigencies of its internal policy and the defense of its territory. Appropriations will be made both for the navy and the army to make them more efficient. There is a good deal of interest felt in this matter.

It is rumored that the Argentine Republic has invited Brazil to intervene between Chili and Peru; upon what authority I do not know. Count Koskull, the Russian minister, spoke to me on the subject a few days since.

The financial condition of Brazil is not satisfactory, though she maintains her credit abroad, and I have great confidence in the good faith of the government. I feel a deep interest in the country and entertain the best wishes for its prosperity.

No 203.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, January 22, 1881. (Received March 7.)

SIR: The liberal administration has at last achieved a great triumph in the passage through both chambers of the electoral reform bill. It removes the political disabilities from all classes. Naturalized Brazilians, non-Catholics, and freedmen are now eligible to office under the imperial government.

The success of this important measure is a great step in advance for Brazil, and must contribute largely to its prosperity. Other reforms will be accomplished at an early day, and this great country will make steady progress in the civilization which brightens the closing years of the nineteenth century. After the adoption of the electoral reform bill the ministry in a body tendered their resignations to the Emperor. This act created great surprise. The ministry of Mr. Saraiva had been successful in its policy and had secured the adoption of its measures. The ministry had been sustained by the Parliament and enjoyed the confidence of the Emperor. The ministry, too, enjoys a large share of the confidence and esteem of the people. Mr. Saraiva and his colleagues, however, took the ground that they had been chosen to perform a special task—the accomplishment of electoral reform—and having succeeded in that, it seemed to them proper now to retire, or to receive a new confirmation of official tenure on general grounds.

The Emperor promptly declined to receive the tendered resignations, and expressed his wish that the present ministry should continue in power, as it had his fullest confidence. Of course the ministry may now enter upon the accomplishment of other measures without the sense of being restricted in the consideration of a general policy for the advancement of the interests of the country. I do not doubt that its measures will be liberal and beneficent.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

No. 73.

Mr. Logan to Mr. Evarts.

No. 141.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES
IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala City, January 17, 1881. (Received February 15.)

SIR: Under cover of this dispatch, I inclose a printed copy of the new constitution recently promulgated by the authorities of Honduras.

But three articles claim my attention as worthy of particular notice, which I hereby translate in the body of this dispatch:

ARTICLE 1. Honduras is to be considered as a section disintegrated from the Republic of Central America. In consequence it recognizes as its principal duty and most urgent necessity, a return to a union with the other sections of the dissolved Republic. The present constitution shall not stand in the way of the accomplishment of this prime object, but it may be amended or abolished by Congress in order to ratify the facts, treaties, and conventions which may result in the national reconstruction of Central America.

This declaration is so open and significant as to require no comment from me.

ART. 22. Neither Hondureños nor foreigners shall have the right in any case to make a claim against the state for damages or injuries which they may sustain in person or property by reason of the acts of facciones.

As explained in my No. 44, when treating of the new constitution of Guatemala, the word faccion (plural facciones) may mean a military exploit, engagement, or action. It may also mean a faction or turbulent body of men, who, in the name of revolution, may rob the store of a foreigner, tear up the railroad built and owned by foreigners, &c. Under cover of my dispatch No. 45, I inclosed the copy of a declaration made by the representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, and Italy, to the Government of Guatemala upon the adoption of a similar article, giving notice of a determination to protect their fellow-citizens in person and property to the extent authorized by the laws of nations, and irrespective of the local enactments of the Government of Guatemala. A precisely similar declaration was made in the present case by the representatives above mentioned with the exception of your own, who preferred in the present instance awaiting instructions from his government. I respectfully solicit any which you may think the case requires.

ART. 30. Hondureños by birth, (1) all persons who may be, or were born in the territory of the republic. The nationality of the children of foreigners born in Hondureño territory, and that of Hondureños born in foreign territory will be determined by treaty. Where no treaty exists, children born in Honduras of foreign parents domiciled in the country are Hondureños, &c.

This article, with the exception of a power to stipulate differently by treaty, is the same as that adopted by the Guatemala constitution, and commented upon at length in my dispatch No. 44. In that dispatch, the history of the article as relates to Spain and her colonies was given. The point I have desired chiefly to illustrate is this: If the United States makes a declaration that children born of foreign parents within her territorial limits are citizens of the United States, she must concede the right to all other nations to make the same declarations in reference to children born of American parents within the limits of such other nations. This has been practically conceded in the opinion of Attorney-General Hoar, as quoted in the Digest of Opinions, &c., wherefrom it appears that it is not competent for the United States to interfere with the relation its foreign-born citizens may hold under the laws of the country of domicile to that country, although the statute of February 10, 1855, sweepingly declares that all persons born out of the limits of the United States, of American fathers, shall be deemed and considered American citizens. The opinions of the Attorneys-General are not in the legation library and are therefore inaccessible to me. But the reciprocity of usage in this case, or whatever else it may be called, is altogether unfair in its practical operation and outcome.

There is no hardship in being a citizen of the United States, while one remains within her jurisdiction. The laws are mild, just, liberal, wholesome; justice is quickly obtained, and within the reach of all, however poor or lowly. There is no oppression or arbitrary acts of personal rulers; no forced loans and no compulsory military service to the State. The person is free to remain or go as he chooses.

These things cannot be said of all nations, and much less of those of Central America. There is an American citizen born in New York, who has been domiciled in Guatemala for the past eighteen years, where he has valuable properties. He has never for a moment relinquished the idea of returning for residence to the United States and wishes to do so, within the next two years. He has a son, born in this country, who next year will reach the age of eighteen years. Under the Guatemala law this son is a citizen of the country, and when he reaches his eighteenth year, he will be placed in the army of the republic for military service. During the term of such service, he cannot leave the country to return to his own, and it is possible that he may meet his death in involuntarily fighting the intestine battles of a foreign country.

More than this, to be a Guatemalteco subjects the individual to all of the caprices of an arbitrary and personal government. He may be suspected of disloyalty and thrust into prison under rude forms of military law. He may be violated in his person or property, and after the most absurd forms of law, the most exhausting delays, and the most excessive draughts upon his purse, find himself entirely unable to obtain justice. If he desire to flee the country he finds that he cannot do so without a passport from the government, which latter may easily trump up reason for a refusal. These possibilities are not at all overdrawn.

In case of the boy above alluded to, the father recently made application to me for a passport, to protect the son from the obligations of Guatemalteco citizenship. I referred him to the opinion of Attorney-General Hoar, above cited. If you have any instructions as to his case I should be glad to receive them.

The matter stands thus: He is the son of a native American citizen, though accidentally born in Guatemala. Under the organic law of this state he is a Guatemalteco, and subject to all of the requirements of a citizen of this republic. He is liable to military duty, and to all of the abrupt and arbitrary methods of a personal government. While he remains here and it is possible that his departure may be legally prevented as that of any other citizen, he is entitled to no protection from the government which has declared him, as the son of an American, an American citizen. But the person who has acquired naturalization under our laws, though he may not have resided in the United States two weeks, who has permanently abandoned our country, and engaged in business by the side of the unprotected American boy, laughs at the obligations of a Guatemalteco, prosecutes his business, feels assured of his goods, and lives in peace and quietude under the protection of the American flag.

I trust I do not draw the picture larger than the facts will warrant. If I err in my statements or conclusions, I shall be happy to be corrected.

No. 145.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES
IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala City, January 25, 1881. (Received March 8.)

SIR: I have information that the boundary dispute between Costa Rica and Colombia is to be settled by arbitration. A convention was signed in San José on the 25th of December last, which was ratified by the council of state of Costa Rica, signed by President Guardia, and afterwards transmitted to the Colombian Government for like ratification. By the terms of the convention the King of Belgium is named arbitrator, and in case of his non-acceptance of the trust the King of Spain is to be requested to assume it; and in case of his declination also, the President of the Argentine Republic is to be solicited to accept the office.

The parties are to be heard by the arbitrator, and the sentence is to be pronounced within ten months from the acceptance of the position by the arbitrator. Both parties bind themselves to submit to the decision, and the status quo is to be preserved until the decision is formally made.

The selection of the arbitrator does not indicate a very favorable feeling towards the United States by the plenipotentiary of Colombia, at whose instance, as I am informed, the nominations were made.

I have, &c.,

C. A. LOGAN.

[Inclosure in No. 145.—Translation.]

Copy of convention between Costa Rica and the United States of Colombia.

THOMAS GUARDIA, GENERAL OF DIVISION AND PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF COSTA RICA.

Whereas the Grand National Council has decreed the following:

No. 8.

The Grand National Council of the Republic of Costa Rica:

Considering—

That between the respective plenipotentiaries of Costa Rica and the United States of Colombia has been concluded and signed in this city, on the 24th of the present month, the convention, which, submitted by the executive power to the deliberation of this high chamber, word for word, is as follows:

The Republic of Costa Rica and the Republic of the United States of Colombia, equally animated by the sincere desire of maintaining and consolidating their amicable relations, convinced that to obtain this benefit, so important to their prosperity and good name, it is necessary to remove the only source of the difference existing between them, which is no other than the question of boundaries, that is foreseen in articles 7 and 8 of the convention of the 15th of March, 1825, between Central America and Colombia, has been since that time the object of divers treaties between Costa Rica and Colombia, none of which were ratified; and both nations understanding that this antecedent counsels the adoption to-day of other means, more expedient, prompt, and sure of terminating the aforesaid question of boundaries by means of the designation, in perpetuity, of a dividing line, clear and incontrovertible, for the whole extent in which their respective territories are contiguous; in consequence, the president of the Republic of Costa Rica, by virtue of the powers invested in him, has conferred full powers on his excellency Dr. José Ma. Castro, secretary of state and of the department of foreign relations, and the President of the United States of Colombia, specially and fully authorized by the legislative chambers of that nation, on the Hon. Dr. José Ma. Quijano Otero, chargé d' affaires near this government, who, after having mutually communicated their respective full powers, and finding them in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The Republic of Costa Rica and the United States of Colombia agree to submit to arbitration the question of boundaries existing between them, and the designation of a line which shall divide forever and with all clearness the territory of the first from the territory of the second, each one remaining in full, quiet, and peaceful dominion with respect to each other of all the lands left on its side of the aforesaid line, which shall remain without special charge or grievance whatever in favor of the other.

ART. 2. The arbitrator who shall be pleased to accept the charge stipulated in the preceding article shall, in order that the decision may be binding, complete its duties within the period of ten months, dating from the period of his acceptance, and this notwithstanding either of the high contracting parties shall fail to be present to maintain his rights by means of a representative or attorney.

ART. 3. In order that the acceptance of the arbitrator may be held to be duly notified to the high contracting parties, and that these may not be able to allege ignorance thereof, it shall suffice that it be published in an official periodical of the nation of the arbitrator or in that of either of the high contracting parties.

ART. 4. The arbitrator having heard by oral or written argument the parties or party presenting, and having considered the documents that they may produce or the arguments they may make, shall emit his decision without other formality, and this decision, whatever it may be, shall be held immediately as a compact concluded, perfect, obligatory, and irrevocable, between the high contracting parties, who renounce formally and expressly all reclamation of whatever nature against the decision of the arbitrator, and oblige themselves to respect and fulfill it immediately, faithfully, and forever, pledging to this the national honor.

ART. 5. In consonance with the preceding articles and for their execution the high contracting parties name as arbitrator His Majesty the King of Belgium; in the unlooked for case that he shall not choose to accept. His Majesty the King of Spain, and in the event, equally unlooked for, that he shall also refuse, His Excellency the President of the Argentine Republic; in all of whom the high contracting parties have, without any difference whatever, the most unlimited confidence.

ART. 6. That one of the high arbitrators named who may come to exercise the arbitration may delegate his functions, not failing to intervene directly in the pronunciation of the definitive sentence.

ART. 7. If, unfortunately, none of the high arbitrators named can lend to the high contracting parties the eminent service of accepting the charge, they, by common agreement, shall make new nominations, and so successively until some one shall take effect, for it is agreed, and hereby formally stipulated, that the question of boundaries and the designation of a dividing line between the limiting territories of Costa Rica and Columbia shall never be decided by other means than the civilized and humane one of arbitration, preserving in the mean time the statu quo agreed on.

ART. 8. The present convention shall be submitted to the approbation of the Grand National Council in the Republic of Costa Rica and of the legislative chambers in that of Colombia, and shall be exchanged in the city of Panama within the shortest time possible.

In testimony whereof the plenipotentiaries above mentioned sign and affix their respective seals to two originals of the present convention.

Done in the city of San José, capital of the Republic of Costa Rica, on the twenty-fifth of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty.

[SEAL.] JOSÉ MA. CASTRO.
[SEAL.] J. MA. QUIJANO OTERO.

National palace in San José, twenty-seventh of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty.

Finding the foregoing convention arranged in all its parts according to the instructions given to the plenipotentiary, who has adjusted it on the part of this republic, let it pass to the Grand National Council for the fulfillment of article 8.

T. GUARDIA.

The secretary of state in the department of foreign relations.

JOSÉ MA. CASTRO.

Considering that this convention is correct in its form, reasonable and equitable in its foundation, and evidently useful and necessary to the two contracting nations, Decree.

SOLE ARTICLE. Let the above convention be approved and ratified in all its parts, which shall have the force of law when they shall have been exchanged in due form.

To the executive power.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Logan.

No. 145.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 7, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatches in regard to the union of the Central American States have been received. You have hitherto been confidentially instructed as to the opinions of this government on that important subject.

It would have been a matter of great gratification if your dispatches had indicated the prospect of an early consummation such a confederation, or if you had been able to suggest some directly practical method by which the United States could aid in the establishment of a strong and settled union between the independent republics of Central America.

There is nothing which this government more earnestly desires than the prosperity of these states, and our own experience has taught us that nothing will so surely develop and guarantee such prosperity as their association under one common government, combining their great resources, utilizing, in a spirit of broad patriotism, their local power, and placing them before the world in the position of a strong, united, and constitutionally governed nation.

Precluded both by sentiment and interest from the indulgence of any desire for increased territory; anxious to open to its commerce beneficial interchange with foreign products, and to give to such commercial relations the freest extension; taking a profound interest and a just pride in the system of republican government which its own example has introduced and encouraged on the American continent, the Government of the United States would do all in its power to foster the growth of stable and strong institutions in its sister republics of the south.

You cannot impress too strongly upon the government to which you are accredited or upon the public men with whom you associate the importance which the Government of the United States attaches to such a confederation of the states of Central America as will respond to the wants and wishes of their people.

The population of the Central American states, taken together, is not far from three millions; nearly, if not quite, as great as the population of the thirteen colonies at the time of the revolution against the British Government in 1776. The growth, prosperity, and power of this country, since that period, has been almost entirely due to a union of the States, such as is now warmly commended to Central America. Our popular maxim, that "In union there is strength," finds its counterpart in the equally manifest truth that, "In division there is weakness." So long as the Central American States remain divided they will fail to acquire the strength and prestige to which they are entitled.

The rapid improvement and the promise of prosperous development, which is exhibited in the neighboring Republic of Mexico, may well serve as an encouragement. It cannot be long before the relations between the United States and Mexico will become closer and more valuable by the completion of those railroad connections, which so peacefully combine and reconcile the interests of independent countries, and so surely and safely concentrate the intelligence and spirit and power of the people whose territory they enrich. And the statesmen of Central America may feel certain that, with a common representative government, wielding the power and consulting the interests of the separate states, their connection with the railway system of the continent will be eagerly sought, and they will both give and receive the advantages which always follow the establishment of commercial relations and political sympathy. All internal improvements, including the great project of an interoceanic canal, would receive great stimulus and aid from a firm union of the Central American states and the strong government that would grow from that union.

It would, however, be premature for this government to do more than express this general conviction until it had officially learned, not from one, but from all of the Central American States, that public opinion there was ripe for the execution of such a plan.

I have not deemed it necessary to refer specially to the probability of any attempt on the part of any European power to acquire territory within any of the Central American States, or to interfere by force with the free political action of these republics. This government has no reason to believe that such acquisition or intervention is anywhere contemplated. But should closer and more careful observations induce you to apprehend any such attempts, you will assure the government of those states that upon this subject the policy of the United States is fixed. That policy was long since announced, and has been steadily maintained, and this government has every reason to believe has been generally acquiesced in by the European powers. Should unforeseen and unfortunate circumstances ever bring it into question, the United States will be prepared to repeat and enforce the principle declared by its highest authority, more than a half century ago, that—

> With the governments (of the American continents) which have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing or controlling in any other manner their destiny by an European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

In the confidential instruction of this department of August 3 last, No. 85, you were authorized to visit the capitals of the several Central American States, with a view of ascertaining and reporting the condition of the public feeling upon the subject of confederation. No formal report has been made by you of such visit.

In a dispatch of the 29th of October last, No. 109, it was also suggested that an effort should be made to induce those States separately to enter into the Postal Union. If in your opinion this latter purpose could now be effected, the opportunity might be thus afforded without attracting undue attention of putting yourself in communication with the friends of the movement for a closer political union between those independent republics, and thus enabling this government to decide whether the project had taken such practical shape as would enable us to give it substantial assistance.

You will understand that great discretion must be exercised in such a proceeding, lest the local prejudices and interests of the separate States should be excited or antagonized, and that any appeal to the support and assistance of this government should not only be direct in its character, but should represent the wishes and purposes of all the States which expect to become members of such a confederation.

While a direct and unfriendly interference by European powers with the sovereign rights or the domestic policy of the Central American States is not anticipated, there is understood to exist on the part of the subjects of those powers a financial interest, which it may become the duty of their governments to protect. As one of the necessary and most important objects of any proposed confederation would be the establishment and maintenance of a stable national credit—indeed, as without such a foundation, there could be no permanent and prosperous union—this government would wish to receive from you the fullest information you can obtain as to the financial condition of those States, the condition of their public debt, the extent to which any foreign government has gone in enforcing the claims of its subjects and the methods by which the Central American States have undertaken the discharge of their obligations.

In short you are requested to give a comprehensive exhibit of the political, social, and financial condition of the Central American States, and to furnish it as promptly as the necessary labor of the investigation will allow.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

[Personal.]

At your discretion you can read this dispatch in full to the ministers of foreign affairs of the different republics of Central America.

[Extract.]

No. 179.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES
IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala City, May 24, 1881. (Received June 17.)

SIR: In previous dispatches I have had occasion to mention the unsatisfactory relations between Guatemala and Mexico, arising from their unsettled boundary line. I have now to report that these relations are growing still less satisfactory, and that an open rupture between the two countries is not an improbable result of the near future.

The State of Chiapas, in Mexico, as well as Guatemala, belonged to the old captain-generalcy up to the period of the termination of the latter, when the people of the former State elected to attach themselves to Mexico under the short reign of Iturbide, whom the Guatemaltecos now charge with having forced the State from them. A certain portion of Soconusco, a province of Chiapas, has become the modern bone of contention between the two countries, not so much because of the value of the territory, perhaps, as because of an important river, with a fair harbor on the Pacific, which traverses it. Two or three expensive commissions have been appointed to survey and report upon a line to divide the two countries, whose work, up to this time, has not amounted to anything. In the mean time local disturbances, consisting of raids over the border, have occurred at intervals until the feeling has become quite embittered.

In confirmation of the disposition of Mexico to make a rupture with Guatemala is the fact I learned from a reliable person last evening, that Mexico had lately sent 1,000 well-armed men into Soconusco, and that 2,000 more are expected soon to arrive there.

I give you these statements for what they are worth. I believe that Mexico has every disposition to come to an open rupture with Guatemala on the boundary question, and that she may do so. Barrios is intensely hated in Mexico, and he returns the feeling with compound interest. Though Barrios does not realize it, yet his government, in one sense, is a very weak one. * * * His old opponents * * * are held down with an iron hand, made up, so to speak, of muskets and brass bands. By themselves they can do nothing, but if Mexico, with a few thousand men, were to call away the Guatemala troops from the capital to defend the border, twenty-four hours would not elapse before the clericals would be massed into an aggressive army, and, being in the majority, Barrios would soon be crushed.

* * * * * * *

The conquest of Central America, however, would be a different thing. Were Mexico prosperous, and with ability to maintain an army and prosecute a war, Montufar's idea would not be an improbable one, nor would the mere conquest be a thing of very difficult accomplishment; but the Mexicans must certainly know that no republican form of government could hold together territory so separated by physical barriers as that comprising the countries herein spoken of. Nothing but the strong arm of an absolute monarchy, supported by ample resources of money, ships, and men, could tie them into a single government. When railroads and telegraphs are built so that quick communication can be had from Mexico to Costa Rica such a project may be entertained. At present it is impracticable, and operating upon a smaller scale; the difficulty mentioned constitutes the chief obstacle against a federal union of the Central American States, as heretofore stated to the Department in my dispatches; but a single agency—the protectorate of a powerful country—can make such a union possible in Central America.

The situation, however, is sufficiently interesting to call for this report to you. I shall promptly inform you of any additional matter of interest.

No. 148.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 26, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 145, of the 25th of January last, inclosing copy of the convention between Costa Rica and Colombia, for the settlement by arbitration of their boundary differences, has been received.

As no official communication has been made to this government, either by Costa Rica or Colombia, of the execution of this convention, no formal representation can be made upon the subject.

But you will take an opportunity, informally, to bring to the knowledge of the Government of Costa Rica that you are aware of the impression which has been made upon your own government by this information. You will say that while the Government of the United States recognizes the wisdom of the method of arbitration for the solution of such differences, and while it neither pretends nor desires that it should be considered the necessary or only arbitrator between the Republics of South and Central America, it feels that by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of 1846 with Colombia it is placed in a position in which it has a direct interest in the question submitted to this arbitration; that its guarantee of the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over the territory of the State of Panama and of the neutrality of the Isthmus entitles it to know how and to what extent the territory of that State is to be changed, and that its control over any interoceanic communication across the Isthmus gives it an interest recognized by treaty in any settlement of the littoral possessions of either republic in the neighborhood of any projected canal; that taking these circumstances into consideration, the United States of America are naturally surprised that such an arbitration should have been determined upon without communication with them. You will add that while having no possible objection to the character of the arbitrators selected, and expressing no opinion as to the merits of the contention between the two republics, the United States of America will not hold themselves bound, so far as their rights, obligations, or interests may be concerned, by the decision of any arbitrator in whose appointment they have not been consulted and in whose selection they have not concurred.

You will make this communication temperately and expressly for the purpose of avoiding any future misunderstanding, and you will make it as coming from yourself, with the knowledge of your government, but without instructions to make any representations on the subject.

I have not deemed it necessary to state at large the reasons for this determination, as your own knowledge of our relations with the South and Central American States will sufficiently explain them.

No. 181.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN CENTRAL AMERICA,

Guatemala City, May 27, 1881. (Received June 17.)

SIR: I have to inform you of the following state of affairs in Nicaragua:

Several weeks since the government, through its local officers, compelled a lot of Indians resident in the department of Matagalpa, which is about 125 miles from Leon, in the mountains, to perform some public work, as is usual with most of the republics of Central America. Dissatisfaction arose among them, and an open difficulty occurred, which resulted in the Indians occupying the town of Matagalpa for some two days. After this they were driven back, and, assembling in the mountains to the number of some 6,000 or 7,000 men, threatened an invasion of the lower country. Five hundred troops were dispatched at once from Managua to Matagalpa. The officers in command soon learned that the Jesuits were at the bottom of the insurrection, upon information of which the government had them conducted under guard to Managua.

The town of Leon is the headquarters of the Jesuit establishment, and great excitement immediately began therein. Large numbers of men, women, and children, with all sorts of weapons, assembled, crying, "Down with the government," "Long live the Jesuits," &c. The crowd were meditating an attack upon the cuartel, which contained about 70 soldiers. They were prevented in this, however, by a number of foreigners and the quieter class of citizens. Some lives are reported as being lost, however, in street fights.

Soon after this 400 government troops arrived at Leon with the purpose of restoring order and carrying out a decree of expulsion against the Jesuits. My latest advices up to the 14th instant represent a state of great perturbation, with a possibility of serious trouble.

Should further events require it, I shall promptly advise you of their nature.

No. 183.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN CENTRAL AMERICA,

SIR: My dispatch No. 179 informs you of matters relating to Guatemala in their connection with the adjacent republic of Mexico. I have now to inform you that President Barrios returned yesterday from his visit to San Marcos, near the border. To-day I had a few minutes' interview with him, during which he informed me that he could not leave here until the 15th of June. His manner convinced me that he has already abandoned the idea of leaving, although as other persons were present I could get no opportunity to talk privately with him. Later in the day, however, I talked further with Montufar about these affairs, when he told me plainly that every day they seemed more threatening. Information of the fact communicated to you in my No. 179, that regular troops were being sent to Soconusco by the Mexican Government has just reached the Guatemala Government, and preparations are now being made to dispatch troops from this capital to the border. * * *

What Mexico may really be meditating you are probably better advised of through our minister, Mr. Morgan, than myself. It is without doubt simply a question of ability with her, not one of disposition or desire. It seems altogether certain that the border raids, often resulting in loss of life, which have been frequent of late, must precipitate a collision between the two governments if some basis of agreement be not soon reached. * * *

My policy has been, and will be, an evasive one, until instructions from Washington may be received. Montufar, who is altogether the best informed man upon our political system in Central America, tries to argue away the probable objections to be interposed by our government against any unwarranted interference in the affairs of our neighbors, and especially the acquisition of territory, and rather regretfully, as it seemed to me, informed me that with the Democratic party in power, the acquisition of Soconusco would be but a question of two days. All this amounts to nothing, however, except that when hope of assistance from the United States is abandoned, Guatemala will undoubtedly make this proposition to one of the European powers. Great Britain, France, and Germany are striving for commercial supremacy in Central America, and there are some possibilities in the case of a character not favorable to our own interests.

Hence, until I hear from you, my policy will be not to give the Barrios government any positive encouragement of favorable action by the United States, and yet not peremptorily to crush every hope in that direction, lest it drive them into another quarter.

Though the present threatening aspect of these affairs may again pass away without open hostilities between the two countries, yet I consider the situation sufficiently grave to recommend it to your careful consideration.

SIR: Your Nos. 179 and 183, of the 24th and 27th instant, respectively, have just been received, and have commanded my earnest attention. The posture of affairs between Guatemala and Mexico, therein shown, had already received urgent consideration on the representations of the Guatemalan minister, Señor Ubico, and an instruction to Mr. Morgan, at Mexico, had embodied the views of this government thereon for formal communication to the Mexican Government. The fuller details of the situation, now received from you, have led me to instruct Mr. Morgan still further in a more explicit, but to a certain extent, confidential sense.

The correspondence in full is herewith transmitted to you for your confidential perusal. The distinctness with which the President's policy in the premises is set forth will, I think, make it unnecessary just now to give you the special instructions as to your conduct which you ask for at the close of your No. 183. I may say, however, that the President deems it no less incumbent upon Guatemala than upon Mexico to endeavor to so shape the course of the dispute as to avoid open hostilities and conduce to an honorable settlement in the interest of all parties.

You will, of course, do all you consistently can in this sense.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 181, in relation to the difficulties with the Jesuits in Nicaragua, I have now to inform you that order having been completely restored in Matagalpa and Leon by the authorities, a decree of expulsion against the brothers of the Company of Jesus was issued by the executive, and, under it, all of the Jesuits in the country left Nicaragua on the 8th instant. There was a very strong pressure brought to bear on President Zavala to induce him to permit the Jesuits to remain; among others uniting in a petition to that effect being ex-President Chamorro, ex-Minister Rivas, and other prominent persons. Zavala was firm, however, holding that they were foreigners, ruling the state by their influence over the common people, and living in religious congregations against the laws of the country. Their passage was paid to Panama by the government. Their expulsion was accomplished without any belligerent demonstrations or breaches of the public order. They are the same body of men expelled by Barrios from Guatemala in 1871. The President feels confident that the legislature will ratify his acts in the premises.

No. 197.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES
IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala City, June 28, 1881. (Received July 20.)

SIR: My dispatches No. 179, under date of May 24, and my No. 183, under date of May 27, ultimo, treat of the relations between Guatemala and Mexico; while my No. 195 informs you of a recent note received by the former from the latter government of a very threatening character.

Mr. Montufar, the minister of foreign relations, showed me the whole correspondence to-day, and having an opportunity to catch the steamer carrying my mail sent by the dispatch bearer, I hasten to advise you of the posture of affairs. The present difficulty relates to the same class of troubles detailed to you in my Nos. 179 and 183, viz: the question of limits and raids over the border. It seems that in December last, a band of Mexicans appeared upon ground which has always been under the jurisdiction of Guatemala; ground occupied by Carrera, the former President of Guatemala, when Barrios and Grenados began their revolution against his government and upon which, one or more battles were fought. His band carried off four Guatemaltecos as prisoners, among them an alcalde of the government. The Jefe Politico of San Marcos, with 100 men, went to a place called Tonintaná for the purpose of a reconnaisance, but nothing further happening they went back to San Marcos. Tonintaná is not in Soconusco, but considerably this side of it, and was not even claimed by Santa Anna when he took the latter from Guatemala. No claim to this portion of territory has ever been made by Mexico heretofore.

This occurrence has become the basis of a fresh correspondence upon the old subject, between the Mexican minister at this capital and the Guatemala Government; the former claiming that Mexican territory had been invaded by Guatemala troops; and at a later period demanding satisfaction through instruction of his government. Guatemala then addressed Mexico directly, endeavoring to show that no offense had been committed; that Mexican territory had not been entered upon, &c. The Mexican Government replied that Guatemala was endeavoring to meet the questions at issue by a policy of delay; that the formation of a treaty which both governments had agreed to in amendment of the treaty of 1877 was being intentionally postponed by the Guatemala minister in Mexico, Señor Herrera; that the territory in question belonged to Mexico; that her dignity had been violated; and that satisfaction—which is understood to mean the punishment of the leaders of the force, Margarito Barrios and Manuel Rocas, a salute to the flag, &c.—was demanded; failing in which, the inauguration of hostilities is very plainly intimated by the note.

The Guatemala Government is greatly alarmed, of course, feeling its utter inability to cope with a power like Mexico. A pacific reply has been tendered and the result of events is awaited.

Guatemala claims that Mexico is pushing her line further every year, and she is confident that it is the settled purpose of Mexico to slice territory from Central America, and perhaps to absorb one or all of the States. She has proposed arbitration to Mexico, upon the boundary question a number of times, but is always met with the reply, that the dispute must be settled by themselves.

This is the Guatemala side of the story. If Mexico really have ulterior designs looking to the acquisition of territory, it seems important that the United States should be in position to consider whether or not her own interests are to be affected thereby. The Guatemala Government in determining to cede Soconusco, or her right to it, at least, to a foreign power, hopes to put a stop in that way to the aggressions of her powerful neighbor. The idea is not a bad one. I am confident that, as yet, no communication upon the subject, with the representative of any other power, has taken place. I have a belief, however, that should the United States decline any interest in these affairs a proposition will be made in some other quarter. I shall watch the matter as closely as possible. * * *

SIR: Referring to your dispatch No. 151, under date of June 21, ultimo, which incloses copies of instructions to Minister Morgan, in relation to the matters at issue between Mexico and Guatemala, I have to report that I have conversed with President Barrios in the spirit of your instruction to me, and find him to be in full sympathy with the ideas advanced by you, in the whole matter.

Nothing new has been developed in the affair, as sufficient time has not elapsed to hear from the Mexican Government in reply to Mr. Montufar's note spoken of in my No. 196.

As to the full merits of the dispute, it is, of course, difficult to form a judgment. It is hardly probable that Guatemala is wholly free of blame, it being a rare case that in any dispute one party is entirely right and the other wholly wrong. As Guatemala, however, is a very small nation compared with Mexico, she is in no position to be aggressive; and the probabilities of ulterior purposes by Mexico, as related in my previous dispatches, are, from a priori reasoning, very strong.

I shall keep you posted in relation to the march of events as observed from my own stand-point.

SIR: The last coast mail brought a note from the minister of foreign relations of Costa Rica in answer to the one sent him, according to your instructions, by Mr. Logan, concerning the proposed arbitration between Costa Rica and Colombia. I inclose a copy of the note clipped from the official journal of Costa Rica, and a translation of the same.

As being calculated to throw some light on the views of the Costa Ricans on this subject, I also inclose a translation of an article from the Mensajero, a journal of San José, sent to the legation with the Gaceta Oficial, commenting upon the notes.

NATIONAL PALACE, San José, July 28, 1881.

SIR: I have received the note, dated June 23, ultimo, which your honor was pleased to remit me, because of having seen in a periodical of Central America the reproduction of the treaty celebrated the 25th of December last, between Costa Rica and Colombia, and by which the high contracting parties submit to arbitration the question of boundaries pending between the two mentioned countries.

Your honor addresses me in an unofficial manner, on account of not having any official notice that the said treaty was ratified by the Government of Costa Rica, and that it had been sent to Colombia to receive like authorization; and that you must believe—these are the exact words of your note [Mr. Logan said, "I am led to believe," which the translator has rendered "debosuponer"]—that it is not yet "definitely approved," because the government of your honor has received no notification of the fact.

Being aware, nevertheless, of the impression produced on the mind of your government by the information you have furnished it, your honor enters, in the note to which I am replying, into considerations of a grave character concerning the form in which the treaty was celebrated, and its possible consequences, arriving at the extreme of assuring me that "the United States of America will not consider themselves as obliged, where their rights, duties, and interests are concerned, by the decision of any arbitrator in whose nomination they have not been consulted, and in whose election they have not taken part," and your honor invokes for the justification of such a surprising assertion the existence of a treaty in which, as you assure me, the United States of America and the United States of Colombia were bound in the year 1846.

Your honor accompanies your observations with expressive protestations of the friendship which happily unites our governments, reminds me of the cordiality of your personal sentiments towards myself, and terminates, asserting that you proceed with the knowledge but without instructions from the Government of the United States of America, in the communication which you make me.

Permit me to observe that the celebration of the treaty of 1846, to which your honor's note refers, was not notified to the Government of Costa Rica, neither before nor after the said treaty received "the final ratification;" but with regard to the apreciaciones (untranslatable) which spring from that antecedent, and to the reply made necessary to the various points touched upon by your honor, I am obliged to delay them until the instructions being received, which I have no doubt the Cabinet of Washington will transmit you concerning this interesting affair, the words of your honor may have official signification, the only one with which I am permitted to submit them to the examination of his excellency designated for the exercise of the executive power, that he may instruct me concerning the answer which they merit.

With regard to the instructions which your honor will receive, I am flattered by the hope that they will be inspired by that noble spirit of respect for the liberty, sovereignty, and independence of other peoples, and to the immovable principles of justice, which keep the government of your honor so highly recommended to the estimation of the enlightened world, and to the favorable judgment of history.

I conclude, renewing to your honor the assurances of my esteem, and of my very distinguished consideration.

TWO DIPLOMATIC DISPATCHES.

The Diario Oficial, No. 1030, publishes a dispatch from the legation of the United States of America, directed on the 23d of June last to the honorable minister of foreign relations of our government, and the respective answer dated the 28th of July ultimo, concerning the legality and efficaciousness of the convention celebrated between Costa Rica and Colombia, for the settlement by arbitrators of the question of boundaries pending.

The pretensions revealed in the dispatch of the honorable minister of the United States of intervention in the arrangement of boundaries between the said nations, manifested by rumors more or less consistent, and by some New York periodicals of recognized political importance, have now come, from being mere rumors of opinions and conjectures, to be affirmations of a diplomatic representative of the Government of the United States of America.

The honorable minister, Mr. C. A. Logan, after manifesting his surprise at his government's not having had any official knowledge of the convention between Costa Rica and Colombia, which furnishes the motive for his dispatch, and making the most cordial protestations of delicacy and friendship, establishes that by article 35 of the treaty of 1846, between the United States and Colombia, that government has a direct interest in the question of boundaries submitted to arbitration; that this treaty likewise gives it the right to know how, and to what point, the Colombian territory is to be modified; that the preponderance of the United States in any interoceanic road across the Isthmus gives it interest, based on a treaty, in any arrangement of the littoral possessions of countries situated in the vicinity of any projected canal; and this being considered, the Government of Washington is surprised that such decision of arbitration should not have been officially communicated to it. And from all this argumentation, he concludes that the said government will not consider itself bound, as concerns its rights and interests, by the decision of any arbitrator for whose nomination it has not been consulted, and in whose election it has not taken part.

The honorable minister of foreign relations of our government, Dr. José Maria Castro, in the substantial part of his answer expresses himself thus: [See inclosure 1.]

This precise and adequate answer will reveal to the Hon. Mr. Logan and his government the disposition and attitude of the Costa Rican chancellory to treat the question which gives rise to the diplomatic correspondence of which we write.

Grave and most transcendental certainly is the question, advanced by the Cabinet at Washington, concerning the arrangement of the boundaries between Costa Rica and Colombia, and the interpretation of the treaty of 1846, between the United States of America and Colombia, so much the more, in our opinion, because the principle of intervention, a principle of international policy admitted in exceptional cases, and with prudent reserve will come to be sanctioned by the pretensions of the United States in an application as arbitrary in its foundation, as perilous in its consequences, seeing that such pretensions obey no other motives nor recognize other object than the exclusive interests, industrial and maritime, of the United States.

All that is definitely expressed and revealed by the dispatch of the honorable minister, Mr. Logan, is, without doubt, material for a serious and conscientious discussion; but at the same time it demands a very attentive and reflective examination. So we shall limit ourselves for the present to a few observations which rebut, under a general point of view, the dispatch of the American legation in Guatemala.

The treaty of 1846, invoked by the Hon. Mr. Logan, whatever might be the interpretation and efficaciousness given it, can only obligate the contracting parties, and it would be entirely absurd to derive from it obligations relative to Costa Rica, or any consequence whatever that would affect the fundamental rights of sovereignty, independence, and jurisdiction of this republic.

The more that the guarantee of the Government of the United States respecting the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama and the integrity of the territory of Colombia, conventionally established, would limit the transient (transeunte) sovereignty of this last nation; said guarantee could not in any manner determine an intervention which would attack the rights of a third which would be beyond the means proportionate to the end for which the guarantee is intended and not authorized by international right. (Bluntschli, Droit international codifie.)

On the contrary, the United States could sustain the integrity of the Colombian territory not in the real and lawful conditions of the latter, but in virtue of the most extreme pretensions of Colombia, extended on one side to Cape Gracias á Dios and on the other to the furthest points of the frontiers with Venezuela and Brazil, deducing from the litigious character of those same frontiers since long before the celebration of the treaty of 1846 referred to.

The interest alleged by the Hon. Mr. Logan, in favor of the United States emanating from the preponderance of that nation in regard to the construction of any interoceanic canal across America, great and legitimate as that interest might be, could never serve as a criterion in a matter of international right, and for results that would affect the rights and licit conveniences of other nations, also interested in undertakings of the nature treated of, and in the free development, sure and prosperous of their commerce and their industry.

Regarding the consideration that the United States neither pretend nor desire that they should be considered the indispensable and sole arbitrator in questions between the republics of South and Central America, we say that, without doubting the sincerity of this declaration, the moral incompetence of the government of the American Union, by reason of the interest which it so emphatically alleges having in any arrangement of the littoral possessions of the countries in the vicinity of any way of communication in this case inhibits that government from the exercise of the impartial functions of judge, as has been opportunely brought to its notice by, among other periodicals, the Courrier des Etats Unis and the Sun of New York.

In conclusion we can do no less than declare with profound emotion, that we would suffer a martyrizing undeception (desengaño), if the Government of the United States representing a great people, ruled by exemplary democratic institution, should adopt with the other sister nations of America, before the world, which looks on with lively interest, a policy, troublesome, radically egotistical, that would sacrifice the sacred principles of justice to the spirit of mercantilism overpowering and dangerously developed; if it should not be inspired with profound respect for the autonomy and independence of other nations; and we would suffer this undeception, which we dare to qualify as melancholy, because we are fervent republicans, and admirers of the great republic of America, and because without destroying the most founded and flattering hopes of the complete triumph of republican institutions in America and Europe, we cannot attribute to that powerful and free nation which inspires us with such hopes any other policy than the truly human, according to the expression of Mr. Pradier Foderé the universal policy of all epochs and all places, which is the sovereign science of obtaining the good by means of justice and liberty.

No. 108.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 13, 1880.

SIR: I transmit herewith, for your perusal, copy of a dispatch,* No. 205, of the 7th ultimo, from Mr. Ernest Dichman, the United States minister resident at Bogota, transmitting the text of a convention concluded at that capital on the 4th ultimo, between the representatives of Chili and Colombia, for the preservation of peace between the two republics.

It does not seem necessary to transmit to you the text of the convention itself, inasmuch as it will probably have been brought to your notice before this instruction reaches you. I may, however, remark that besides advocating the general principle of arbitration in settlement of international disputes, this convention establishes that system of appeal as between the co-signatory states, and provides for the designation of the President of the United States as arbitrator between them in event of a case arising incapable of settlement without recourse to arbitration.

The intelligence conveyed by Mr. Dichman's dispatch is viewed with lively satisfaction, as indicating not merely concurrence with the great principles of international arbitration, which this country has so signally and practically maintained, but as evincing also that confidence in the impartial amity of this government for the sister republic of the American continent which it has always been our high privilege to welcome on every fitting occasion, and to strengthen by our own example of good will and kindly interest in their welfare.

The convention provides, in its concluding article, for ratification and exchange, at Santiago or Bogota, within a year from its date. It may be premature to instruct you to make any official declaration in the premises in advance of the subject of the treaty being brought to your cognizance by the Chilian minister for foreign affairs, but you may now informally say to him, repeating the statement officially in due time if the Chilian Government should invite such a course, that, should occasion for arbitration between the two countries arise under the treaty, the President will deem himself privileged in being able to respond to the flattering trust thus reposed in him, and so evincing the friendship of the people and Government of the United States for both republics.

planatory of Chili's purposes in the war in which she is engaged, as also an English translation thereof.

The government evidently fears that the discussion in the Aria conference may have left an impression that in exacting Tarapacá as a condition for peace, Chili has proclaimed the right of conquest, and the minister's note seems to be directed mainly to the removal of any such belief. It is insisted, as you will observe, that the territory mentioned was demanded as indemnity for damages sustained by Chili because of the war-damages which, it is claimed, Peru is powerless to liquidate in any other way.

The minister also touches upon the proposition made by the allies in the conference to submit the questions in dispute to the arbitration of the United States, justifying the action of his government upon the ground that the results of the war have given to Chili certain rights which cannot well be determined in the manner proposed. As I have heretofore written to you, my judgment is that the proposition for arbitration was not made with the expectation that it would be seriously entertained. Had the reverse been true, I assume that it would have been submitted in some practic ble form, rather than in the intangible shape in which we find it.

Chilian circular to the foreign representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, November 10, 1880.

SIR: At the commencement of the war into which Chili was provoked by the injustice of Peru and Bolivia, my government made haste to lay before the friendly powers the all-powerful reasons that compelled her to seek in war satisfaction for her grossly offended honor and seriously imperiled interests, ends which, notwithstanding Chili's repeated efforts, it had been impossible to attain by conciliatory measures.

The absence of all military organization consequent upon years of peace; the habits of the people of Chili, devoted to peaceful toil and industry; the financial crisis that then weighed upon the country, the wholly unarmed condition of the republic, which had reached the point even of disbanding the national guard, her sale at public auction of a number of her war vessels; will demonstrate to your excellency's government how distant from Chili was the thought of her tranquility being interrupted, how sincere was her love of peace.

The Republic of Chili would never have abandoned her peaceful attitude had it not been for the continued violations of her most sacred treaty obligations on the part of Bolivia, the discovery of the existence of a secret compact against her integrity, entered into between Peru and Bolivia, at a time when the outward relations of these powers with Chili were of the most friendly character, and finally the outrages committed against her citizens, all of which compelled her to resort to arms in vindication of her rights. Involved thus in a war against her will, and after having exhausted all peaceful means, she found herself compelled to accept it, as a last resort, and she now relies to the end upon the justice of her cause and the unfailing zeal of her people.

The hopes entertained by Chili have not been disappointed by the course of events; since the declaration of war her navy has annihilated the maritime power of Peru, and now holds her principal seaports under blockade. Her armies, in numerous engagements, have everywhere overcome her enemies; and she is now the mistress of all the Bolivian coast, and a very considerable portion of that of Peru. An uninterrupted series of defeats have made it impossible for the allied forces to recuperate their losses, and rendered them powerless to resist our attacks. In the face of events already consummated, and the stern reality of what has already occurred, the attempts made by them to conceal the truth or misrepresent facts are futile.

Under this condition of affairs, so unquestionably in favor of Chili, the Government of the United States, through its representatives near the three republics, tendered their good offices as meditator for the re-establishment of peace. The Government of Chili, true to its traditions and sincere in its international policy of loyal friendship with all nations, with a firm resolution that she would interpose no obstacle toward securing peace upon a firm and lasting basis, accepted the offer of the great Republic of the North, notwithstanding her repeated successes against the allied powers.

Mediation having been accepted by Peru and Bolivia, it was also accepted by Chili, and for this purpose a conference was held at Arica. The mode and result of this meeting your excellency will find by a perusal of the copies of the documents I have the honor to herewith transmit.

By the protocol at the first meeting of the conference, a memorandum was submitted of the conditions that Chili deemed essential for the attainment of peace, which, as I will proceed to explain to your excellency, were the only ones that could have permanently and equitably put an end to the war.

In view of the situation of the belligerents, the series of victories obtained by Chili, both on land and sea; the enormous expenditure of blood and treasure that the war had cost the country; the blind tenacity with which the enemy persisted in carrying it on, thereby uselessly increasing the expense and injury; the outrages committed on our citizens whose property was confiscated and they expelled from the country; the obstacles thrown in the way of the development of our industries and commerce; in view, I repeat, of these antecedents, it was not reasonable to suppose that Chili would appear at the conference of Arica with other than a firm resolution to insist upon an indemnity that should, in part at least, compensate for so many and so great sacrifices on her part.

But two courses presented themselves that could make the attempt at an understanding and peace a success. One, the surrender of the territory according to the first clause of the memorandum submitted to the plenipotentiaries of the allies, as indemnity for the expenses and damage of the war, or the exaction of a stipulated sum of money upon the same grounds, Chili holding the territory now in her possession as security and until the final payment of such idemnity.

The adoption of the latter course found an insuperable obstacle in the deplorable condition of the finances of both Bolivia and Peru. For years past the embarrassed financial condition of the allied powers has been well known. Crushed by the weight of an enormous debt, without credit abroad, and, what is still worse, without order or stability at home, they had totally ignored their obligations. Unable to meet the interest on their debt, the fact of the bonds of Peru appreciating in value upon the occupancy of her territory by Chili, will show the point of insolvency she had reached in the estimation of Europe. How, then, would it have been possible for Chili to obtain from such powers the payment of the indemnity to which she was justly entitled?

An arrangement by which Chili should hold the territory occupied by her armies as security for the payment of the expenses of the war by means of the income derived from the same, was wholly inadmissible. The holding of this territory would necessarily involve the military occupation of it by the conquering power, and this could not be done without a heavy outlay to be paid by the allies. On any other terms the result, as far as regarded Chili, would be illusive. Such an arrangement never could have put an end to the war; however moderate the sum agreed upon as indemnity might be, it, increased by interest and the charges of a military occupation, would very soon place the sum beyond the power of the debtors to pay, while the irregular condition of affairs in the territory, by reason of the coexisting authority of Peru and Bolivia on the one side, and the forces of Chili on the other, would be productive of serious conflicts that could not long delay in again resulting in war, thus defeating the prime purpose that Chili has in view, the attainment of a solid and lasting peace.

The security being thus inadequate, Chili had no other resource but to demand the surrender of the territory as the only means of securing indemnity for her sacrifices and expenses. The government, in insisting on this stipulation in its instructions to its plenipotentiaries, did not simply seek an extension of its frontier. The faithful exponent of the feelings of its people, it adopted the only means that the depressed condition of the finances of the allies rendered it possible for them to grant; one that circumstances had imposed, and which they were powerless to change.

The allied governments will no doubt endeavor to make it appear, as did their plenipotentiaries at the conference, that Chili maintains the right of conquest.

The truth, however, will prevail in spite of all that may be said. The fact, clear and indisputable, alone remains, and that is, that Chili is entitled to indemnity for the expenditures and sacrifices incurred by her in the war, and that the allied governments have not the means of satisfying them.

The surrender of the territory furthermore involved on the part of the successful power a recognition of the mortgages and incumbrances created upon it by Peru to her foreign creditors.

The Republic of Chili possesses an extensive and fertile soil whereon her people may toil in peace. She has always lived in harmony, devoted to her own internal improvements. She has ever given proofs of her desire to seek a peaceful solution of all international questions. She has always been ready to defend the integrity and independence of her sister republics, when threatened. She has been the champion of Peru herself, and never could she have suspected that her demand that Bolivia should live up to her treaty obligations would have been the cause of war. The Republic of Chili, with such antecedents, never appeared at the Arica conference for the purpose of maintaining the principle of the right of conquest. She appeared there solely for the purpose of obtaining indemnity for the expenses of the war, and the assurance of a solid and lasting peace in the future. Such was her right and the natural consequence of the justice of her cause, confirmed by the successes of her armies. The powers that forced her into an unjust war and that still insist on carrying it on, notwithstanding their reverses, are the ones responsible for the sacrifices and damages of which they were the cause. Chili under these circumstances commits no more act of conquest than does a creditor commit an act of despoliation when he seeks payment of the debt due him through the real estate of his debtor who has nothing else with which to discharge his obligation.

The demand of Chili is, furthermore, founded on other considerations not less worthy of notice. The territory belonging to the allied powers, lying south of the Camarones Valley, consists for the most part of desert lands with a very small native population. The greater part of its occupants are foreigners, of which the Chilians are the most numerous. It is they who are the principal owners and workers of the country. It is their capital and enterprise that have given value and importance to those hitherto barren wastes. The peculiar topographical conditions of this territory, the fact of its being at so great a distance from the seat of its own government, while its commerce and traffic largely depended on Chilians, made the character of the surrender demanded, as far as national susceptibilities were concerned, much less obnoxious than may have been the case in other instances of the annexation of neighboring territories. National susceptibilities, as is well known, do not exist in that locality, and this would have gone very far toward facilitating an easy assimilation of its elements, tending to the development of its wealth and prosperity.

Chili seeks that compensation to which she is justly entitled; she seeks a guarantee of peace for the future. In assuring these important ends, she proposes as a basis of arrangement a means that is not now and never has been ignored among civilized powers. Her frank and open demands should not be viewed with suspicion, nor should they inspire the other portions of the American continent with any feelings of uneasiness.

The other conditions demanded by Chili are the natural sequences of the first condition. They are in perfect harmony with the obvious and rightful considerations emanating from the subject.

The war has not only entailed enormous sacrifices of treasure and of blood upon Chili as a nation, but it has also been productive of similar sacrifices to her commerce and industries, and to her private citizens who were business residents of the territory of the allied powers from whence they were forcibly expelled after being despoiled of their real estate, their capital, and their personal property. The second and third stipulations of the memorandum provide for the indemnification of such injured parties. Their future, after the manner in which they were treated, cannot be a matter of indifference to my government.

The fourth stipulation is open to no objection whatever. It simply provides for the delivery to Chili of a transport that was the property of the republic.

The fifth becomes a matter of absolute necessity, when we take it into consideration that the war grew out of a secret treaty, and that the incentive to the treaty of alliance now sought to be brought about between Peru and Bolivia, as stated by these governments themselves, was to more effectually hostilize Chili. Such a treaty would be a standing menace to the peace that Chili so earnestly desires.

The sixth stipulation, with reference to the holding of certain territory as a guarantee for the fulfillment of the other conditions imposed on the allied powers, is absolutely necessary.

The seventh and last becomes important, in order to give to the peace sought to be obtained that stability which the interests of the belligerents themselves, as well as the other powers of the Pacific, demand. If the northern frontier of Chili should be established at the Camarones Valley, and the port of Arica thereafter fortified and converted into an impregnable fortress, it would be a constant source of danger to Chili, obliging her also to fortify her own frontier. In either case peace would always be in jeopardy, and this may be avoided by making the said port for all time simply and exclusively a commercial port.

Furthermore, it is known that when the boundaries of Bolivia were arranged, she was given a geographical position inimical to the logical development of her resources. It is also known that the port of Arica is the most suitable and best adapted to the commercial requirements of Bolivia. This fact would render its fortification still more dangerous and improper.

Before concluding the present communication I deem it proper to notice two important points submitted to the Arica conference, viz, the proposition of the plenipotentiaries of the allied powers to bring the war to a close through the arbitration of the power then acting as mediator, and the interpretation given by his excellency Mr. Baptista, the Bolivian plenipotentiary, to the secret treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, so mysteriously entered into between Peru and Bolivia in 1873, and which has been the cause of the lengthened struggle in which we now find ourselves involved.

Unquestionably the method most in harmony with the interests of humanity, the one best calculated to preserve friendly international relations, is, in cases of conflict, to submit to the arbitration of a third power, which might impartially and without prejudice decide as to which side was right; but this method has its appropriate time for application; unfortunately, the time at which it was suggested by the plenipotentiaries of the allied powers deprived it completely of its applicability. When diplomacy had exhausted all its resources and war appeared to be inevitable, Chili proposed arbitration to Bolivia and it was peremptorily declined. War was the consequence, and your excellency is aware of the results and sufferings that have followed. Chili, through her efforts, has obtained decisive advantages over her adversaries, and has by reason of the war become invested with clear and important rights. What point, therefore, would the arbitrator be called upon to decide? The question of rights is one no longer open to discussion; it is now simply a question of accepting or declining through war what has already been accomplished by war.

Success has its obligations, and they increase in the ratio of the sacrifices and the risks incurred in obtaining it. These obligations are still further increased when dealing with an enemy who, although defeated by land and sea, tenaciously holds out in the struggle when resistance is vain.

Bolivia rejected arbitration when it was offered by Chili; Peru became her ally with a full knowledge of all the facts, and it is now both logical and natural that she should accept the consequences of a war that she might have prevented, but did not choose to prevent. If such was not the case, if it should be held that a power is obliged to suspend hostilities at the request of its antagonist, when the antagonist had provoked the war and been unsuccessful in its issues, war would cease to be a right. In the midst of the train of evils that it entails it would fail to achieve the only benefit to be derived from it, that of compelling the vanquished to repair the injury they had caused, and to respect in the future the rights of others in accordance with international treaties. But for these considerations Chili would have accepted the proposed arbitration with full confidence in the impartiality of the arbitrator.

With regard to the interpretation of the secret treaty of 1873 given by his excellency Mr. Baptista at the conference, I will take occasion to say that the circumstances under which it was negotiated, and the means adopted to give it effect, show a purpose directly the opposite of the one sought to be attributed to it, viz, that of strengthening the fraternity and union of the republics of America. In no other light can explanation be given for the secrecy that was observed with regard to it for more than six years; for the irregular manner in which it was passed by the congresses of Peru and Bolivia; the denial of its existence by the former of these powers when interrogated by Chili with regard to its existence; and, finally, the exclusion of Chili from it when Chili at the same time was the ally of the powers that were conspiring against her. The treaty was a measure directed against Chili, and my government so demonstrated at the commencement of the war.

The foregoing statement I trust will convince the sober judgment of your excellency's government that Chili took part in the conference with a sincere desire of putting an end to the war; that the conditions submitted by her plenipotentiaries were the only ones that could be productive of a lasting and equitable peace; that her conditions were neither exaggerated nor onerous under the circumstances in which the belligerents are now placed, and that whatever may be the consequences of the continuance of the war, the allies, through their persistence in refusing to accede to the just demands of Chili, are alone responsible for it.

My government, sir, profoundly regrets that the Arica conference has been barren of results, and that the noble efforts of the mediating power in its endeavor to re-establish peace have been sterile, for all of which efforts Chili is sincerely grateful.

With the request that your excellency will be pleased to make this statement known to your government, I have to beg you will accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration, and remain your most, &c.,

WASHINGTON, November 19.

OSBORN, Minister, Santiago, Chili:

You are authorized to unite with your colleagues in pressing upon Chili the adoption of the measures agreed upon in a diplomatic conference at Lima for securing the lives and property of neutrals when Lima is attacked. This authority is to be used only in case these measures are approved by Christiancy and yourself as within neutral policy and this concurrent representation seems to you useful. You are also authorized to join in asking a direct answer from Chili, if in your judgment the requirement is justified by the situation. Telegraph your action.

EVARTS,
Secretary, Washington.

A few brief interviews with my colleagues touching the details of the measures adopted at the Lima diplomatic conference, and the steps hitherto taken, having in view their acceptance by this government, served to impress me with the belief that any movement now by this legation in the direction indicated in your dispatch would be exceedingly impolitic, and this belief was strengthened to conviction by the informal conversation which I subsequently had with the minister of foreign relations, Mr. Valderrama.

As you know, the measures referred to provide for the protection of all private property, neutral and otherwise, in Lima, and determine the manner in which the Chilian army may bombard, occupy, and police the city. This programme was submitted to the consideration of the Chili cabinet early in October by the European representatives. In response, this government declared that it was its purpose to protect as far as possible the interests of neutrals in Lima, but maintained, in justification of a refusal to adopt unqualifiedly the measures proposed, that such action might tend to seriously embarrass the army in its legitimate operations. With this answer, it seems, the European governments were not satisfied; hence this renewed effort in the direction indicated.

I have had frequent conversations with Minister Valderrama concerning the protection of lives and property of neutrals in Lima in case that city should be attacked, and on the 24th instant, in an interview with him, I intimated a desire to know what measures had been adopted to that end. He was quite unreserved in his answer, asserting that it was the sincere desire of his government that neutral interests should be fully protected, but justified the refusal to adopt the measures proposed by my colleagues upon the ground heretofore stated; that is, that the army might thereby become seriously crippled in its proper operations against the enemy. He informed me, however, that, with a view of affording the protection desired, the general in command had been directed to confer with the dean of the diplomatic corps at Lima, and, in so far as the same could be done without interfering with the legitimate operations of the army, to adopt his suggestions to that end. An English translation of the note of Minister Valderrama, repeating the assurances given me in conversation, will be found inclosed.

In addition to what is said in the minister's note, I may add that I have known for some time that the government was desirous of avoiding a scandal growing out of the operations at Lima, and that precautions were being taken to that end. The minister of war is with the army in the field, as is also Mr. Altamirano, the intendente of Valparaiso, who has gone north as secretary for the general-in-chief. These gentlemen are men of high standing, and I am assured that the chief reason for their attendance upon the army is the solicitude of the government upon this subject.

On the 26th instant I telegraphed you as follows:

EVARTS, Washington:

Regard pressure of Lima measures useless and impolitic. Government adopts stringent measures for protection of neutrals in Lima, but rejects European pressure.

OSBORN.

I am credibly informed that the Lima measures were not pressed upon this government by the European representatives with much earnestness; but, be that as it may, the response to their efforts was substantially the same as that received by me.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI, MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, November 25, 1880.

SIR: Referring to the conference that I had yesterday with you, and in which you expressed a desire to know if my government had taken any measures for the purposes of protecting, in as far as may be possible, the persons and interests of foreigners located in Lima and Callao, in case hostilities against said cities should be undertaken, I now have the honor to repeat to you what, in that respect, I expressed to you verbally.

My government feels a deep interest in that the persons and property of foreigners should remain as far as possible exempt from all damage in the future operations that it may be necessary to undertake against those cities, and to this end has recommended very especially to the chief of our forces that he should respect these persons and properties. In order that this protection should be more efficacious, my government has directed that the chief of our forces should hear all the suggestions that the dean of the diplomatic corps in Lima should be pleased to make to him in this regard, and to accept them in so far as they should not be opposed to or should not embarrass the legitimate operations of our army. My government believes that on the field of actual operations the Chilian commander, upon the representations of the dean of the diplomatic corps, will be the better able to protect the important interests of neutrals, which the government ardently desires may be protected in the military operations which our army has been directed to carry out.

No. 115.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 27, 1880.

SIR: My attention has been called to the following passage of your remarks at the conferences held at Arica, Peru, on the 15th of October last, as reported in the second protocol of those conferences:

His excellency Mr. Osborn remarked that it seemed proper to him, as well as to his colleagues, to place upon record that the Government of the United States does not seek the position of arbiter in this question. A strict compliance with the duties inherent to that position would involve much trouble and great labor, and, while he could not doubt that his government would accept the position if properly requested to do so, it was nevertheless proper that it be understood that its representatives did not court that distinction.

As it is not quite clear what the meaning and scope of your remark on that occasion was, I will thank you for explanation upon the subject. There was no impropriety in your making it clear to the representatives of the belligerent states that this government had no desire to unduly urge its arbitration upon them. If, however, it was your purpose to convey the impression that we would not cheerfully assume any labor and trouble incident to arbitration in the interest of peace and the service of justice, you have not correctly appreciated the views and wishes of this government. It is the sincere desire of the President to see an honorable and lasting peace secured among the South American republics now engaged in war, and he will shrink from no effort or responsibility which can properly tend to the accomplishment of such a desirable result.

In order to remove a possibly wrong impression which your language may have made upon the representatives of the belligerent powers, you will read this instruction to the minister for foreign affairs of Chili; and I will instruct Mr. Christiancy and Mr. Adams to read a copy of it to the ministers for foreign affairs of Peru and Bolivia, respectively.

No. 187.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, January 3, 1881. (Received February 24.)

SIR: In the circular note which Minister Valderrama addressed to the diplomatic corps on the 10th of November last, a copy and translation of which accompanied my No. 181, is found the following sentence:

The cession (meaning the cession of Tarapacá by Peru), carried with it, moreover, the obligation on the part of the victorious nation of accepting as its own all the hypothecate bonds given by the Peruvian Government to its foreign creditors.

The guano beds in the Tarapacá district, as is well known, have been mortgaged by Peru to secure the payment of a large part of her public debt, and the expression here quoted was very generally accepted as a formal recognition of these obligations in the event of a change in the sovereignty of the district. Subsequent discussion in the newspapers and in the two houses of Congress, however, apparently developed the fact that the country was not prepared to accept this doctrine as its policy, and the minister has felt himself called upon to explain in another note, a copy of which I herewith inclose, with English translation.

It will be observed that the interpretation which had so very generally been accepted was entirely erroneous, and that the minister does not desire to be understood as having committed his government to the payment of any part of the Peruvian debt or the recognition of any of its mortgages, but that all claims in the district referred to are to be settled in accordance with the principles of international law.

If the influences which have driven Minister Valderrama into writing the inclosed note shall continue in the ascendency, I fear that Peruvian mortgage bonds are likely to remain a very precarious investment.

I am not aware that any of these mortgage securities are held by American citizens. The loan for which they were issued was raised in Europe, principally in Great Britain and France.

Mr. Valderrama to Mr. Osborn.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI, MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, December 24, 1880.

SIR: On the 10th of November ultimo I had the honor of addressing you informing you of the result of the conference held on board the Lackawanna in the bay of Arica, in the last days of October.

In view of the instructions given to our plenipotentiaries in the event of certain contingencies arising in connection with the conference, I then stated that the ceding of the territory claimed by Chili would have implied on the part of Chili a recognition of the mortgages executed by Peru to her foreign creditors. This expression has not been properly understood, as appears from the interpellations directed to the government in both houses of Congress.

By some, without taking into consideration the special circumstances of the case, the circular of the 10th of November was understood to be an absolute definition of the rights of creditors in the nature of an assertion of a principle; such an interpretation of it is not correct. The statement referred to is intimately connected with the instructions given to our plenipotentiaries, and both refer to the occurrences of certain contingencies that never took place.

It is known that the conference at Arica was productive of no result, and that matters continued in the same condition they were before the said conference was held. This statement thus becomes merely an expression of a fact which might have occurred had the allies accepted all the conditions with which it was connected. It might also have been a result of certain compensations or advantages provided for in the instructions, but it embraces no recognition of a right as has been supposed by some.

It was not intended in the circular alluded to, to define the rights of creditors. Its scope was confined to certain facts that had already occurred and others that might have grown out of the Arica conference if certain circumstances then in view had taken place. The failure of the negotiation left matters in the same condition in which it found them, and consequently the rights alleged by certain parties with regard to the Tarapacá district will be settled according to the precepts of international law. This is the line of conduct which the Government of Chili has observed from the beginning, and in which it has the purpose of continuing.

With this explanation of the true meaning of the statement which has been so imperfectly understood, I avail myself of the opportunity of offering to you the sentiments of high consideration with which I am, &c., duty in the premises, I have the honor herewith to inclose a copy, with English translation, of a note received by me from the minister of foreign relations, together with a copy of my reply.

You will observe that the minister, after informing me of the execution of the convention referred to, says that it meets with the approval of his government, and will be presented to the National Congress for its action. He adds a request to be informed whether the designation of the President of the United States to act as arbitrator in certain contingencies mentioned in the convention will prove acceptable to the Government of the United States.

My reply, as you will see, is an assurance that the President will deem himself privileged in being permitted to respond to the flattering trust reposed in him, if his services should be required.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI,
DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, December 23, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that on the 3d of September last a convention "ad referendum" was entered into at the city of Bogota by the minister of foreign relations of Colombia and the chargé d'affaires of Chili near that republic, copy of which accompanies the present, by the terms of which both countries agree to submit to arbitration the decision of all questions that may arise between them and which it may be found impossible to decide by diplomacy.

My government has no hesitancy in accepting the principle of arbitration thus established, and will submit the convention to the National Congress.

With regard to the designation of His Excellency the President of the United States of America as umpire in the cases specified in article II, my government hopes that it will not prove unacceptable to your excellency's government, and that in it your government will see a reciprocation of the many and strong proofs of friendly feeling that Chili has received from it.

Notwithstanding these marks of confidence, I am directed by His Excellency the President of the republic, in bringing this subject to your notice, to inquire whether the Government of the United States will give a favorable consideration to the selection which has been made of the President of the Union for the cases referred to.

I avail myself of the occasion to renew the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 23d ultimo, inclosing a copy of the convention entered into on the 3d of September last "ad referendum" between the Republic of Chili and that of Colombia, providing for the settlement by arbitration of all such questions as may arise between the two governments which it may be found impossible to arrange through diplomatic intercourse, designating at the same time the President of the United States as umpire, and inquiring whether the government of the United States would lend favorable consideration to the selection therein made of its President as umpire for the cases provided for by the convention referred to.

In reply I have to say that I can best answer your inquiry by transcribing the text of a communication on this subject received from my government under date of October 13, and which is as follows:

"That should occasion for arbitration arise under the treaty, the President will deem himself privileged in being able to respond to the flattering trust reposed in him, and evincing the friendship of the people and Government of the United States for for both republics."

I may add that my government experiences the liveliest satisfaction at the course proposed by your excellency's government and that of the Republic of Colombia, regarding it as a concurrence in a great principle successfully inaugurated and put in practice by the Government of the United States.

SIR: The information which the Department gleans from the press reports that the Chilian forces have taken Lima and Callao, and that the Peruvian forces and government have fallen back into the interior.

Under these circumstances, of which I have as yet no confirmation from yourself and Mr. Christiancy, it is naturally to be inferred that the time has come when the Peruvian Government would not refuse to treat for peace upon any supportable basis, and that it would turn to the good offices or mediation of this government, with hope, if not expectancy, of an end to the war being reached.

I have, to-day, instructed Mr. Christiancy to press upon the Government of Peru, and upon such Chilian authorities as he may have access to, the earnest desire of this government to bring about a peace without delay and upon reasonable and honorable terms, compatible with the true welfare of all the belligerents, so as to be lasting. I have directed him to urge the desire of this government with all that pressure which, under the circumstances, may appear to him to be admissible and proper to the gravity of the occasion.

No. 195.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, February 24, 1881. (Received April 5.)

SIR: Referring to your instruction No. 115, wherein you quote from remarks made by me at the Arica conference touching the suggestions there made concerning the submission of the questions in dispute to the President of the United States as arbiter, and in which you express an apprehension that possibly I may not have correctly interpreted the views of the Government of the United States in that regard, I have to say that I have read your instruction to the minister of foreign relations, as therein directed, and am assured by him that his government has not been misled in the least by the remarks quoted by you from the protocol.

For nearly two years this government has known of the earnest desire of the President of the United States to see an honorable termination of the unfortunate war in this section, and of his willingness to contribute in every proper manner to the accomplishment of that result. This assurance in the precise sense of your instruction, if not in its exact language, has been given not once only, but repeatedly, until there has been left no room for doubt upon that subject.

The remarks quoted, to be correctly appreciated, should be read in connection with the discussion which was then going on in the conference, and in the light of surrounding facts. They were not intended to qualify or change, in the slightest degree, the views of the Government of the United States as hitherto made known to the several belligerents. Their purpose was to cover the single question then being discussed, and I am not informed that either of the belligerents understood them in any other sense.

As you well know, since the Chilians succeeded in getting possession of the province of Tarapacá this government has not been willing to listen to suggestions regarding peace which did not involve a cession of such province by Peru. The State Department contains many dispatches from me to this purport, and I judge the allies were well informed on this point. It is impossible that they should have remained ignorant of the fact that the condition of public sentiment here was such as to preclude the possibility of a peace upon any other basis. When Mr. Christiancy was here, prior to the conference of Arica, President Pinto told him emphatically that our mediation would come to naught unless Peru was ready to make this concession. I assume that the Piérola government was informed of this by Mr. Christiancy, upon his return to Lima, and prior to the acceptance by Peru of our mediation; but, be that as it may, I am positively assured that President Piérola was made acquainted with the facts in this regard by the European representatives in Lima. That they could not have been ignorant in Peru on this point is evidenced by the fact that Mr. Christiancy felt himself warranted in saying to President Pinto that he was confident that the demand made by Chili would be conceded.

With this understanding, then, our mediation was accepted, and the conference convened at Arica in October. The ministers who went from Chili were instructed to demand, among other things, Tarapacá. The sentiment of the country was a unit upon this point, and the government could not have done less and stood.

In the presence of these facts you will, perhaps, be able to comprehend with what surprise and mortification I listened to the reply of the allies in the second conference, wherein they announced that the very condition which was irrevocable presented an "insurmountable obstacle" to the conclusion of a peace. It was after this announcement of the conclusion reached by the Peruvian ministers, that Mr. Baptista, of Bolivia, following an assurance that he and his colleague were quite in accord with the representatives from Peru, suggested that perhaps the difficulty might be solved by leaving the "remaining questions" to arbitration by the United States. The allies knew perfectly well that the "remaining questions" were comparatively nothing in the settlement of the difficulty. They understood then, as the Peruvian Government at least had understood before our mediation was accepted, that the unbending demand of Chili would continue to be the cession of Tarapacá, and that peace was impossible unless that point should be yielded. In view of all this, how hollow was the proposition touching arbitration; how insincere.

It will not be forgotten that circumstances conspired to make our mediation exceedingly unpopular in Chili. For present purposes it will be sufficient to refer to this fact generally without calling attention to the causes therefor. So strong was the sentiment in opposition to the movement immediately preceding the holding of the conference that I am confident the government would have gladly retraced its steps in that matter if it could have honorably done so. The country was exceedingly sensitive upon the subject, and there was very great danger that the government would fall. All this I knew perfectly well, perhaps better than my colleagues. I felt the full responsibility of my position, and endeavored to so discharge my duty as to leave the United States Government blameless, let what might be the result of the movement. With this knowledge, and this determination, the remarks which you quote were made, and now, in the light of subsequent events, I do not hesitate to say that if a different course had been pursued by us—if we had given to the proposition submitted regarding arbitration a quasi approval—American influence here would have been very seriously crippled, if not entirely destroyed. As it was, the United States Government came out of the movement standing better here than it had ever stood before.

Trusting that this explanation may prove satisfactory,

[Extract.]

No. 198.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, March 23, 1881. (Received May 4.)

SIR: I have deemed it quite unnecessary to burden the archives of the State Department with the scattered information which has from time to time reached me from Peru since the occupation of Lima by the Chilian forces, as you have doubtless been placed in possession of all needed knowledge of events there by Minister Christiancy. Lima is but little farther from New York, in the matter of mail communication, than it is from Santiago, and you are, I judge, made acquainted with incidents there transpiring almost as soon as I am.

The negotiations regarding peace have, on the part of Chili, been intrusted to Messrs. Vergara and Altamirano, two of the ministers who participated in the Arica conference, and from what I learn I conclude that these gentlemen find their task by no means an easy one. While the war is practically at an end, yet serious difficulties appear to stand in the way of peace negotiations. Whether these difficulties might not in a measure have been avoided presents a question which I am not prepared to discuss, nor am I sufficiently informed to warrant an expression of opinion as to the real source of the blame, if blame there is. The fact is, there are two pretended governments in Peru, that of Piérola and that headed by Calderon.

The Chilian ministers, as you know, have emphatically declined to enter into negotiations with Piérola, alleging as a reason, as I understand, that his government is without the necessary strength. It is whispered, and perhaps truly, that other influences contributed to this determination, among which I may mention what is termed here an insulting and untruthful insinuation by Piérola in one of his recent official papers to the effect that the perfidy attached to the premature commencement of the battle of Miraflores, on the 15th of January, was chargeable to the Chilian army. It will be remembered that on the morning of the 15th, through the friendly efforts of the diplomatic corps in Lima, a qualified armistice was arranged between the two armies, which was to continue until midnight, but that notwithstanding at about two o'clock in the afternoon fire was opened, and the bloody battle of Miraflores followed. It is no secret here that in this engagement the Chilian army narrowly escaped serious disaster, and the government, the army, and the people, are alike severe in their denunciations of Piérola for what they term his treachery in this matter.

The government of Calderon has been accepted by several of the Peruvian provinces, but there still remains a considerable portion of country which has not acknowledged its authority. I am induced to believe, however, that President Pinto hopes that it will have acquired ere long sufficient strength to warrant this government in entering into negotiations with it. Mr. Altamirano is on his way down the coast now, and will reach Santiago in a few days. He comes, I infer, to confer with the government regarding the situation in Peru, and perhaps, to receive final instructions touching the terms to be exacted in a treaty of peace.

There is every reason why Chili should conclude a peace at the earliest possible day, and I think the government so looks upon it. What terms are to be insisted upon I do not know, but judge they will be quite as severe as Peru, in its impoverished condition, can possibly comply with. In this regard, however, I see evidences here of a modification of public sentiment, and from this I expect much.

I need scarcely assure you that my efforts shall continue to be exerted in facilitating the restoration of peace. This, your instructions, as well as my sense of duty, would require; but I find an additional incentive in my great desire to avail myself of the leave of absence granted me by the State Department, and so long held in abeyance because of the war. Since the receipt of instructions No. 119, which came to hand by the last mail, I have had a friendly conversation with Minister Valderrama concerning the negotiations at Lima, and after the arrival of Mr. Altamirano I expect to see him again, when I may have something worth communicating. The information upon which the instruction above mentioned was based seems to have been somewhat faulty in that it indicated that President Piérola, with his army, had retired to the interior. It is reported here, and believed, that the Peruvian army was entirely dispersed, and that Piérola took refuge in the mountains surrounded by a few followers only.

About 6,000 of the volunteer troops have been returned to Chili and mustered out of the service. General Baquedano, the commander-in-chief, accompanied them, and they were received with universal rejoicing.

SIR: In my No. 198, in speaking of the prospects of peace, I informed you that Mr. Altamirano, one of the ministers authorized to treat with Peru, was on his way to Chili. Since his arrival he has had extended interviews with the government regarding the situation in Lima, and as a result I have good reason for believing that the President's hopes touching the government of Calderon have been very seriously weakened. The impression seems to be gaining ground that the demoralization prevailing in Peru is so great as to prevent the establshment, at present, of any government with sufficient solidity to warrant Chili in negotiating with it. If this should become the view of the government, as seems probable, the indications are that the policy for the future would involve the removal to Chili of all valuables belonging to the Government of Peru, the destruction of all means of defense, and the withdrawal of the Chilian forces to Arica. From this point, it is inferred, they would watch with interest the movements of the factions in Peru in their struggles for the ascendency. Minister Vergara has been sent for, and is expected in a few days, when it is understood a definite course is to be determined upon.

If the policy which I have outlined should be adopted, all talk regarding a formal peace would be mere speculation.

SIR: The representatives here of Great Britian, France, and Italy, acting jointly under instructions, have tendered the mediation of their respective governments, with a view of putting an end to the war, but this government has deemed it advisable to decline their offer.

I conclude that the agents of the European powers were not dissatisfied with the answer which they received. They probably regard the present unsettled state of affairs in Peru as presenting a serious obstacle to negotiations, and are, I judge, not disappointed that they should be excused, by the action of this government, from entering upon the performance of a work which would seem to have so little promise of a happy result.

No. 205.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, May 7, 1881. (Received June 7.)

SIR: In my No. 201, of date April 5th, regarding the war in this section, I mentioned the fact that the minister of war, Mr. Vergara, who had been with the army at Lima, had been sent for, and was then on his way to Chili. Since his arrival the government has labored to reach a conclusion touching the course to be pursued with Peru, and to that end numerous and extended discussions among the ministers and prominent citizens of the republic who had been invited to participate, have taken place. Three plans or propositions were discussed: First, that spoken of by me in my No. 201, involving the withdrawal of the army to Arica; second, the occupation of the entire Peruvian coast by the Chilian forces, and its government by Chilian authorities; and third, the strengthening of the government of Calderon and the negotiation of a peace therewith. The propriety of entering into negotiations with Piérola was not even dignified with a consideration. After much labor the government reached the conclusion that the last proposition afforded the easiest way out of their complications, and it has been determined to send to Peru, in charge of the negotiations, Mr. Godoy, who in times past represented Chili in Washington. Mr. Godoy is well qualified for the delicate post which he is called upon to fill. He occupied the position of minister to Peru for several years immediately preceding the opening of hostilities, and is thoroughly informed of that country and its people, and of the causes which brought about the present war. In conversation with me yesterday, he expressed the belief that three or four months would serve to bring the difficulties to a conclusion, and it is to be hoped that the result may prove him to be not oversanguine.

The ministry has freely counseled with me regarding the difficulties of the situation, and, in view of their previous determination to have nothing to do with Piérola, I cannot but applaud the result of their deliberation. To vacate the country now would be to turn it over to anarchy, and to attempt to occupy the entire coast would in time involve both countries in ruin. The most feasible way to peace is, in my opinion, the one resolved upon. In fact it is the only one which offers any reasonable hope of a solution of the difficulties during the present generation.

I have endeavored to impress upon the authorities here, and not without, I judge, some measure of success, the propriety of their affording the government of Calderon greater freedom of action than it has hitherto enjoyed. I have urged upon them that if it is their purpose to strengthen and dignify the new government, and place it in a position to claim recognition at home and abroad, they should give it possession of the capital freed from the embarrassments of Chilian military rule, and should enable it to raise revenue for its proper support. It will be remembered that the new government has been confined to a small village in the neighborhood of Lima, which was exempted from the operation of martial law, while the capital has been occupied by the the Chilian military authorities; and it will also be borne in mind that the custom-house at Callao, almost the only source from which revenue can be readily raised, has remained in possession of the Chilians.

This government will unquestionably insist upon the relinquishment by Peru of the province of Tarapacá, and unless the Peruvian authorities shall be found ready to concede this, the attempt to make peace will fail. It is probable, also, that Chili will demand the province of Moquegua, which includes the towns of Arica, Tacna, and Moquegua; but I incline to the belief that they will not insist upon this to the extent of endangering the negotiations. They will doubtless move cautiously, however, taking good care to see that they are to be sustained by the country; and as the public expectation has been raised to a most extravagant point, their way may be beset by serious difficulties.

I regard it as quite probable that the terms of the treaty may provide for the maintenance of Chilian garrisons at Callao and Arica until some minor conditions shall be complied with. And it is well perhaps for the interests of those who are concerned in the preservation of order there that the term of this occupation should not be limited to too brief a period.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of the message of President Pinto, delivered to Congress at the opening, on the 1st instant, as also an English translation thereof.

You will observe that the President has seen fit to maintain silence touching the matter of the negotiations now being attempted with the belligerents on the north.

The boundary dispute with the Argentine Republic, of which the President makes brief mention, has continued to remain a source of much anxiety to the more thoughtful citizens of the republic. On more than one occasion the two countries have been on the point of going to war, and it has appeared of late that unless the controversy should be brought to a close, hostilities could not long be postponed.

Appreciating the desires of our government for an amicable arrangement fo this question, I have labored for several months, in concert with my colleague in Buenos Ayres, to find a basis which would seem to offer a solution of the difficulty, and I am now happy to be able to inform you that, as a result, the two cabinets are so nearly in accord that there can be but little doubt of a speedy and amicable settlement of the vexatious question. Washington, June 13, 1881.

SIR: I have received from your colleague, Mr. Thomas O. Osborn, of Buenos Ayres, a confidential report concerning the praiseworthy efforts made by yourself and him to lessen the strain which exists between Chili and the Argentine Republic, touching the Patagonian boundary dispute, and to bring about the peaceful and final arbitrament of the question.

I need not at this late day, in the light of the long maintained and consistent attitude of the United States in favor of international arbitration as a means of averting unfriendliness or the deplorable horrors of warfare between nations, and especially nations of one blood and one history, express the gladness with which this government would do all in its power to aid in so fortunate a disposition of this dangerous issue. I am sure that the readiness of the United States to lend its good offices in this direction on any honorable and practical basis, is already so appreciated on both sides as to need no formal declaration. Chili, especially, must be aware of this general disposition in view of our attitude with respect to the projected arbitration with Colombia, and in view also of the earnest efforts of the President to subserve alike the interests of peace and the material welfare of both Chili and Peru, as seen in the peace conferences of Arica.

You should, however, lose no fitting opportunity of impressing this benevolent disposition on the mind of the Chilian Government without undue insistence or obtrusiveness. In doing so, you should take especial care to create a trusting conviction on its part that the United States, whether as counseling peaceful arbitration, or in the possible resort of being chosen as arbitrator, would approach the question with absolute impartiality, having no bias toward either phase of the contention, and no desire for aught save the ascertainment of the right and the manifestation of justice. You should also let it be distinctly seen that we do not seek the position of arbitrator, but that if the offer were made at the common instance of the parties, our sense of duty toward our sister republics of the distant South would forbid our declining it.

A somewhat similar instruction is this day written to Mr. Thomas O. Osborn at Buenos Ayres.

I shall await, with interest, your report of whatever may transpire in this relation.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

No. 2.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 15, 1881.

SIR: The unfortunate condition of the relations between Chili and Peru makes the mission upon the duties of which you are now entering one of grave responsibility and great delicacy. Difficult as would be any intervention of the United States under ordinary circumstances, our position is further embarrassed by the failure of the conference at Arica, undertaken at our suggestion. It is evident from the protocols of that conference that Chili was prepared to dictate and not to discuss terms of peace, and that the arbitration of the United States upon any questions of difference with the allied powers of Peru and Bolivia was not acceptable and would not be accepted by the Chilian Government. Since that time the war has closed in the complete success of Chili, and in what can scarcely be considered less than the conquest of Peru and Bolivia.

This government cannot therefore anticipate that the offer of friendly intervention in the settlement of the very serious questions now pending would be agreeable to the Government of Chili. It would scarcely comport with self-respect that such an offer should be refused, and it would be of no benefit to Peru and Bolivia that it should be offered and declined. But I am sure the Chilian Government will appreciate the natural and deep interest which the United States feels in the termination of a condition so calamitous in its consequences to the best interests of all the South American republics. It should also know that if at any time the interposition of the good offices of this government can contribute to the restoration of friendly relations between the belligerent powers, they will, upon proper intimation, be promptly offered.

While, therefore, no instructions are given you to tender officially any advice to the Government of Chili which is unsought, you will, on such opportunity as may occur, govern your conduct and representations by the considerations to which I shall now call your attention.

Without entering upon any discussion as to the causes of the late war between Chili on the one side and Peru and Bolivia on the other, this government recognizes the right which the successful conduct of that war has conferred upon Chili; and, in doing so, I will not undertake to estimate the extent to which the Chilian Government has the right to carry its calculations of the indemnities to which it is entitled, nor the security for the future, which its interests may seem to require. But if the Chilian Government, as its representatives have declared, seeks only a guarantee of future peace, it would seem natural that Peru and Bolivia should be allowed to offer such indemnity and guarantee before the annexation of territory, which is the right of conquest, is insisted upon. If these powers fail to offer what is a reasonably sufficient indemnity and guarantee, then it becomes a fair subject of consideration whether such territory may not be exacted as the necessary price of peace.

But at the conclusion of a war avowedly not of conquest, but for the solution of differences which diplomacy had failed to settle, to make the acquisition of territory a sine qua non of peace is calculated to cast suspicions on the professions with which war was originally declared. It may very well be that at the termination of such a contest the changed condition and relation of all the parties to it may make readjustment of boundaries or territorial changes wise as well as necessary; but this, where the war is not one of conquest, should be the result of negotiation and not the absolute preliminary condition on which alone the victor consents to negotiate. At this day, when the right of the people to govern themselves, the fundamental basis of republican institutions, is so widely recognized, there is nothing more difficult or more dangerous than the forced transfer of territory, carrying with it an indignant and hostile population; and nothing but a necessity proven before the world can justify it. It is not a case in which the power desiring the territory can be accepted as a safe or impartial judge.

While the United States Government does not pretend to express an opinion whether or not such an annexation of territory is a necessary consequence of this war, it believes that it would be more honorable to the Chilian Government, more conducive to the security of a permanent peace, and more in consonance with those principles which are professed by all the republics of America, that such territorial changes should be avoided as far as possible; that they should never be the result of mere force, but, if necessary, should be decided and tempered by full and equal discussion between all the powers whose people and whose national interests are involved.

At the present moment, the completeness of the victory of Chili seems to render such a diplomatic discussion impossible. The result of the conflict has been not only the defeat of the allied armies, but the dissolution of all responsible government in Peru. Its soil is occupied, the collection of its revenues transferred to the conquerors, and its executive, legislative, and judicial functions in abeyance. It can neither enforce order within nor assure peace without.

An effort, and apparently a very earnest and honest one, has been made to create a provisional government, which shall gradually restore order and the reign of law. But it is obvious that for such a government to succeed in obtaining the confidence either of its own people or foreign powers, it must be allowed a freedom and force of action which cannot be exercised while Chili holds absolute possession and governs by military authority. This government, therefore, has been glad to learn from its minister in Chili, whom you succeed, that the Chilian authorities have decided to give their support to the efforts of Señor Calderon to establish on a steady footing a provisional government in Peru.

You will, as far as you can do so with propriety and without officious intrusion, approve and encourage this disposition on the part of the Chilian Government, and this Department will be exceedingly gratified if your influence as the representative of the United States shall be instrumental in inducing the Government of Chili to give its aid and support to the restoration of regular, constitutional government in Peru, and to postpone the final settlement of all questions of territorial annexation to the diplomatic negotiations which can then be resumed with the certainty of a just, friendly, and satisfactory conclusion.

In any representation which you may make, you will say that the hope of the United States is that the negotiations for peace shall be conducted, and the final settlement between the two countries determined, without either side invoking the aid or intervention of any European power.

The Government of the United States seeks only to perform the part of a friend to all the parties in this unhappy conflict between South American republics, and it will regret to be compelled to consider how far that feeling might be affected, and a more active interposition forced upon it, by any attempted complication of this question with European politics.

If at any time you shall judge it expedient and advantageous to read this dispatch to the minister of foreign affairs, you are authorized to do so. The decision on this point is left to your discretion.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

No. 219.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, July 22, 1881. (Received September 22.)

SIR: I am gratified to be able to report that the cabinets at Santiago and Buenos Ayres have finally determined upon an amicable solution of their boundary dispute, and have executed a treaty to that end. As you know, this controversy has been one of long standing, and of much bitterness. It needs no rash foresight to comprehend that a war between these republics would be a most disastrous one. For years they have been engaged in supplying themselves at great expense with the elements deemed necessary for such a contingency. Millions of dollars which ought to have been devoted to the development of material interests have been expended in the purchase of powerful iron-clads and destructive artillery, all in anticipation of the war which has seemed inevitable.

Appreciating the dangers of the situation on the 15th of November last, after a confidential interview with President Pinto, I took upon myself to address my colleague at Buenos Ayres on the subject, urging that we should use our friendly offices for the purpose of putting the controversy in a way for amicable arrangement. My communication elicited a prompt and approving response, since which time we have exchanged many letters and numerous lengthy telegraphic dispatches, with the favorable result hereinbefore indicated.

The line of division fixed follows the water-shed of the Andes as far south as the fifty-second parallel of latitude, running thence east on said parallel until its crossing with the seventieth degree of longitude, from which point it extends in a southeasterly direction by way of "Monte Aymond" and "Monte Dinero" to "Point Dungennes," at the mouth of the Straits of Magellan. South of the straits the line commences at cape "Espiritu Santo," in latitude 52° 40′, and runs thence south upon the longitudinal line of 68° 34′, until its intersection with Beadle Canal. The territory to the east of this line, together with State Island and the adjacent keys, belongs to the Argentine Republic; that to the west, with the remaining islands, is conceded to Chili.

The provision regarding the straits is of vast importance to the commercial world, and I therefore quote it:

> The neutrality of the Straits of Magellan is hereby guaranteed in perpetuity, and such straits shall be forever free to the flags of all nations. To secure the neutrality and freedom of navigation above provided for, it is agreed that no fortifications or military establishments which might interfere with the same, shall be erected or constructed.

There will doubtless be considerable opposition in the Chili Congress to the ratification of the treaty; but it is the opinion of those usually best informed, that it will prove of no avail. The administration is strong, and is evidently determined to force the measure through Congress. The provision regarding fortifications in the straits will furnish the chief ground of opposition.

I cannot but regard this as a very happy termination of my diplomatic life here. With this question out of the way, it strikes me that there ought to remain no serious obstacle to a general disarmament in South America.

To-day I am in receipt of a note from the foreign office in acknowledgment of my services in this matter, an English translation of which I herewith inclose.

I have, &c.,

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, July 22, 1881.

SIR: It is with special satisfaction that I now proceed to fulfill the instructions received from His Excellency the President of the Republic, by manifesting to you the very sincere gratitude of this government for your able and distinguished co-operation in the preliminary negotiations that have led to the establishment of the bases of the treaty fixing the boundaries between Chili and the Argentine Republic.

Both countries, as you are aware, are now about to close their differences by means of an arrangement which will establish a solid and loyal friendship between them; and it is to you, sir, as I am happy here to acknowledge, that the re-establishment of this friendly feeling is in a great measure due; a measure that insures a condition of things that is indispensable to the future welfare of the two neighboring nations.

Intimately connected as your name is with the making of this international treaty, a treaty which can be productive of but good to both nations, your residence here will be remembered for all time with feelings of the liveliest gratitude by Chili.

Be pleased, sir, to kindly accept, &c.,

MELQUIADES VALDERRAMA.

No. 3.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES.
Santiago, Chili, August 15, 1881. (Received September 22.)

SIR: The considerations and instructions contained in your dispatch No. 2, dated June 15, 1881, relating to the course Chili should pursue in the final settlement of peace with Peru, have received my earnest attention.

You say in your dispatch that—

> The Department will be exceedingly gratified if your influence as the representative of the United States shall be instrumental in inducing the Government of Chili to give its aid and support to the restoration of regular constitutional government in Peru, and to postpone the final settlement of all questions of territorial annexation to the diplomatic negotiations, which can then be resumed with the certainty of a just, friendly, and satisfactory conclusion.

If I understand you aright this is the full intent and purport of your dispatch.

Taking this for granted, I have the honor to report that, so far as the assurances of public men can be relied upon, your instructions have been complied with, your ideas of final terms of peace accepted, not only by the present administration at Santiago, but, still better, by Señor Santa Maria, the President elect, whose administration will have begun when you receive this note.

I beg your patient attention to the somewhat lengthy explanation I am compelled to make of my action in the matter.

As soon as I received your instructions I made inquiries to ascertain the real intention of the Government of Chili regarding peace with

Peru. For a time I was completely misled; it seemed as if the government had no plan, but would leave the whole matter of final settlement to the incoming administration. In this I was mistaken, as were the public men of Chili with whom I conversed, outside the President and his cabinet. I discovered later on that the President was alarmed at the views you advanced, delicately brought to his attention, and in all probability would not be inclined to accept them. I at once became satisfied that the President and his cabinet held not only other views, but were contemplating absolute peace with the government of Señor Calderon. I therefore did not deem it wise to acquaint the secretary of state and the President with the full purport of your dispatch. I adopted what I thought to be a wiser course; I called upon Señor Louis Aldunate, the first friend of the President elect, a gentleman of great ability, who, I have reason to know, will occupy the first position in the cabinet of President-elect Santa Maria. I read him your dispatch, and at the same time informed him of my belief regarding the intention of President Pinto. After a full discussion of each separate point, and explanations of what I believed to be the result of misinformation on your part regarding "annexation of hostile territory" (to which I will refer again), your views were substantially accepted as wise and just. Señor Aldunate immediately acquainted President-elect Santa Maria with the contents of your note, and both have assured me—

That not one foot of Peruvian territory will be exacted by force unless all efforts of diplomatic negotiations shall fail, and that in no case can Chili treat finally with the government of Señor Calderon until it shall appear that his government is respected and obeyed throughout Peru, which does not obtain at this moment. That no doubt President Pinto would like to celebrate the last days of his administration by a proclamation of peace with Peru, with the government of Calderon, a government without a single element that constitutes a real government, and that would fall at once but for Chilian protection.

I was invited to attend Congress the following day, when the government would be interpolated regarding its plans and purposes. I went, found the House crowded with people, and, amid great excitement, heard the cabinet of President Pinto questioned and worried by Señor Lira, the first orator of Chili. I intended to send you translations of the speeches in this debate, but am too unwell to attempt it. I have been confined to my bed the greater portion of the time since my arrival in Chili. This debate developed the fact that President Pinto was contemplating peace with the government of Calderon—peace which, from the nature of the debate, I was satisfied, must of necessity include territorial annexation. Intimate friends of the administration not only confirmed this belief, but convinced me further that President Pinto was determined to accomplish his purpose; that he yet had time, and that the government of Calderon was in no condition to refuse any conditions Chili might impose. How to prevent this without giving offense to President Pinto I could not satisfactorily answer. I had gained the incoming administration; this was not sufficient. I determined finally to approach the administration, and change its purpose if possible. I sent for Señor Aldunate and Señor George Huneens, the solicitor for the government whose name you will find frequently mentioned in the paper relating to the Arica conference, and asked them to arrange for me a meeting with the secretary of state and secretary of war, the dominant members of the President's cabinet.

After some delay this was agreed upon, and a conference was held at my house last night between Señor Valderrama, secretary of state, Señor Vergara, secretary of war, Aldunate, and Huneens. The conference lasted from 7 p. m. till one in the morning. I am too ill to give you a full account of the meeting; the result is all I can forward at this time.

Your dispatch was read and fully considered, and its advice and suggestions pressed upon the secretary of state. He finally replied. "The ideas indicated by Secretary Blaine are in direct conflict with those held by the Government of Chili, and if we abandon our policy it is out of respect for the opinion of the administration at Washington. You may therefore say to your government, that every effort would be given by Chili to strengthen the government of President Calderon, giving to it the most perfect freedom of action, considering the Chilian occupation. That no question of territorial annexation would be touched until a constitutional government could be established in Peru, acknowledged and respected by the people, with full powers to enter into diplomatic negotiations for peace. That no territory would be exacted unless Chili failed to secure ample and just indemnification in other and satisfactory ways, as also ample security for the future, and that in no case would Chili exact territory save when Chilian enterprise and Chilian capital had developed the deserts, and where to-day nine-tenths of the people were Chilians; and finally that Chili would never consent to submit her rights gained in battle to the arbitration of any European power." This embraces, I think, all the important points contained in your dispatch; and, if so, then I trust I have fulfilled my instructions.

The character of the territory, its people, &c., that Chili may finally be compelled to demand, I will speak of in my next communication. One other matter and I have done. The secretary of state has just placed in my hands the following telegram, dated Lima, August 16:

> Hurlbut, the United States minister, has notified Calderon that the United States will under no circumstances permit annexation of territory to Chili; he has also repeated this statement to outside parties. It is now the subject of conversation here, complicates and endangers our occupation.
> Commandant in Chief.

If this be true, which I cannot believe, it will not only create bad feeling here in Chili, but compromise my action. Certainly it is not in conformity with my instructions, for you distinctly say "Peru and Bolivia should be allowed to offer such indemnity and guarantee before the annexation of territory, which is the right of conquest, is insisted upon." Again, you say, "If these fail to offer what is a reasonable, sufficient indemnity and guarantee, then it becomes a fair subject of consideration whether such territory may not be exacted as the necessary price of peace." In no way can the letter or spirit of your dispatch be tortured into saying "The United States will not permit in any case annexation of territory to Chili." General Hurlbut has not sent me the Department cipher, or I would telegraph him, that he may know that he has been misunderstood or misinterpreted, and in time correct false impressions. If my mission is a delicate one his is still more so, for he has two governments to deal with, the Chilian Government, under Lynch, and the provincial government of Calderon. I have done what I could to satisfy the secretary of state that there must be some mistake; that you would not send one class of instructions to me and another to our minister at Lima.

Very respectfully, &c.,

J. KILPATRICK.

No. 8.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, October 14, 1881. (Received November 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose copies of Señor Balmaceda's note of the 8th instant, and my reply of same date.

In a previous communication I called your attention to the great disquiet caused by the tenor of General Hurlbut's remarks when presented to Señor Garcia Calderon. This was soon largely increased by telegrams from persons in high position in Buenos Ayres, stating, in the most positive terms, my government had determined to prevent any annexation of Peruvian territory, and to oblige Chili to accept an indemnity in money or its equivalent. It was further added to by the general's note to Señor Garcia Calderon, and by the reports of his general and private conversation, in which he apparently confirmed the position assumed to have been taken by my government; and, lastly, by the terms of his memorandum to Admiral Lynch.

In replying to Señor Balmaceda, I deemed the time had arrived for me, as far as my strength would permit, to take advantage of the authority given in my instructions, and to make clear to the Government of Chili the entire uniformity in the instructions to both legations, and to establish beyond a doubt that my government holds fast to the policy adopted at the commencement of the war. I have ample assurances that my note has given great satisfaction.

Regretting that the unfortunate state of my health will not, for the moment, allow a more exhaustive statement of affairs, and trusting my action will meet your approval,

I am, &c.,

J. KILPATRICK.

[Inclosure in No. 8.]

Mr. Kilpatrick to Mr. Balmaceda.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Santiago, October 8, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your excellency's note of this date, in which you call my attention to the fact that the daily papers of Valparaiso and of this capital have given publicity to a memorandum sent by my colleague in Lima, the honorable Mr. Hurlbut, to Rear-Admiral Lynch, commander of the Chilian forces in the capital of Peru. Your excellency is surprised at the publicity given to a confidential document of little importance, considering the form and circumstances under which the same was produced. Your excellency therefore considers it convenient to direct a note to this legation with the view of establishing the good faith and sincerity of the relations so happily cultivated by our respective governments.

Although, as your excellency is aware, I have been for some weeks past, and still am, seriously unwell, recognizing as I do the serious consequences, complications, and misunderstandings that might possibly arise, consequent from the unwise publicity of the memorandum of Mr. Hurlbut to Rear-Admiral Lynch, and the spirit thereof, at least so far as may be judged from the documents as published, the circumstances oblige me, despite the warnings of my medical advisers, to accede without delay to the wishes expressed by your excellency, and replying, although perhaps not in so definite a manner as, owing to the occasion, I should desire.

In the first place allow me to assure your excellency in most unequivocal manner the Government of Chili has no reason for disquietude, either as respects the intention or the attitude that my government may assume as to the war on the Pacific coast.

The Government of the United States has not at any time interfered officiously in the public affairs of other countries, not even when its own interests have been compromised, and much less would it do so when the interests involved are those of friendly nations respecting whom there can be no motive inducing it to partiality.

I had read the memorandum of Mr. Hurlbut, as also the speech at his reception by President Garcia Calderon, both articles having been forwarded to me from Lima some time since, and I at once communicated with my government regarding the same. The first of said documents cannot be considered as having either official or diplomatic character, as the author himself says in the note of which your excellency has sent me a copy.

The instructions given me by my government are, undoubtedly, the same as those given Mr. Hurlbut, and it may be said in truth that they have none of the spirit predominating in the document to which your excellency alludes. The instructions of the Secretary of State, Hon. Mr. Blaine, contain nothing of doubtful meaning, he having such decided confidence in the intelligence, justice, and generosity of the Government of Chili that he authorized me to make them known to His Excellency the President, or his ministers, should I at any time consider it convenient to communicate them.

In order that no room for doubt may exist in your excellency's mind as to the position of my government in regard to the conditions of peace between Chili and Peru, and its determination to abstain from taking any part in the matter, I have no hesitation in subjoining a copy of a paragraph of said instructions which reads as follows:

"Since the suspension of the Arica conferences the war has ended in a complete success for Chili, and in what may be considered as little less than the conquest of Peru. This government cannot undertake to suppose that the offer of a friendly intervention in questions still pending would be agreeable to the Government of Chili. But I am sure the Government of Chili will appreciate the natural and profound interest taken by the United States in the ending of a situation so calamitous in its results to the best interests of the South American republics. The Government of Chili must also know that if at any time the interposition of the good offices of this government will contribute to the re-establishment of friendly relations, they (the United States) will promptly offer it whenever it manifests such wish."

It is further added in these instructions that in all conversation with persons of your excellency's government on this subject I am to observe established international law, and that under no condition whatever am I to offer unsought advice to the Government of Chili.

Again, in speaking of the provisional government of Señor Garcia Calderon, which the administration at Washington hoped to have seen established, my instructions are to encourage the same only to the extent that it may be done in a dignified and neutral way by a plenipotentiary, without officious interposition.

I think these extracts of the instructions given me by my government will be sufficient to convince your excellency that there exists no intention on the part of my government of interfering arbitrarily in the conflict existing on the Pacific coast, and that its acts and conduct are those of a friendly nation desirous of proceeding in the most delicate manner.

I trust, therefore, that your excellency's government will continue its full confidence in the long and well-established policy of the United States, whose friendship has lasted so many years and has never been more sincere than at the present moment.

With the considerations of the highest regards and esteem,

I am, &c.,

J. KILPATRICK.

No. 103.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Kilpatrick.

No. 13.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 22, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 8, conveying a copy of your reply to Señor Balmaseda, has been received. The communication to which it was a reply should have accompanied it, in order that the Department could properly judge of your answer.

Your letter is not approved by the Department. You had had ample opportunity, and, as you have before stated, availed yourself of it, to make known to the Government of Chili the scope of your instructions, and to give it abundant assurance of the friendly feeling of your own government.

If the conduct of Mr. Hurlbut in Peru had given sufficient ground of complaint to the Chilian Government, that complaint should have been made in Washington. Mr. Hurlbut's presentation speech to President Calderon, his memorandum to Admiral Lynch, his letter to Garcia, and telegraphic reports from Buenos Ayres, were not subjects upon which you were called to pass judgment, nor upon which you should have been interrogated by the Chilian Government. Nothing in your conduct or language had excited its apprehensions, and no explanation was due or could have been expected from you, of the language or conduct of your colleague in Peru. I should have been glad if it had occurred to you to call the attention of the secretary for foreign affairs to the impropriety of such a communication, and, in referring to the fact, that your instructions, which you were authorized to communicate to him, gave all the assurance which he could either desire or ask, of the friendly disposition of the United States, I should have much preferred that you had furnished him with a copy of those instructions instead of submitting a paraphrase which does not fully represent their spirit and meaning.

Indeed, I find it difficult to understand how the Chilian Government could have been under any misapprehension as to the disposition or purpose of the United States, when the instructions both to yourself and to Mr. Hurlbut had, in fact, been already frankly communicated; the former, according to your dispatch No. 3, to the outgoing administration, and the latter by this Department to Mr. Martinez, the representative of the present government. It is still more difficult to understand the abolition of the Calderon government and the arrest of the President himself, in the face of your assurance in your dispatch No. 3, where you quote the following as having been addressed to you by Señor Valderrama, viz:

> You may therefore say to your government that every effort would be given by Chili to strengthen the government of President Calderon, giving to it the most perfect freedom of action, considering the Chilian occupation. That no question of territorial annexation would be touched until a constitutional government could be established in Peru, acknowledged and respected by the people, with full powers to enter into diplomatic negotiations for peace.

And it would only have been natural if you had asked, for the information of your government, if not for your own, for what reasons and by what means the Calderon government had, as Señor Balmaseda informed you, "come to an end."

The President has learned with great regret of the arrest and removal of President Calderon, but in the present state of his information will not undertake to appreciate its significance. He hopes that he will, when the facts are better known, be relieved from the painful impression that it was intended as a rebuke to the friendly disposition of the United States. The present condition of affairs, the difficulty of prompt communication with the legations of Peru and Chili, and the unfortunate notoriety of the differences between your colleague in Peru and yourself, have, in the judgment of the President, rendered a special mission necessary. You will inform the Chilian Government that a special envoy will be immediately sent, and you will assure that government that he will come in the spirit of impartial friendship, anxious to learn that recent occurrences have not been intended to disturb the long continued and friendly relations existing between us; and instructed by the President to lay before the Chilian Government frankly, but with a scrupulous consideration for the rights and interests of that government, the views which he holds upon the deplorable condition of affairs in South America, a condition now fast assuming proportions which make its settlement a matter of deep concern to all the republics of the continent. The President cannot but anticipate that this step, suggested by the most friendly interest and justified by our existing relations, will be properly appreciated by the Chilian Government; and he sincerely hopes that no action of that government will tend further to complicate existing difficulties before the arrival of the minister.

No. 16.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 30, 1881.

SIR: You have already been made acquainted by my No. 13, of the 22d instant, with the determination of this government to send a special mission to South America for the purpose of adjusting whatever questions growing out of the contest between Chili and Peru and Bolivia may affect the relation of the United States to the three belligerent powers, or conduce to the restoration of good understanding among them.

I have now to inform you that William Henry Trescot, esquire, of South Carolina, has been commissioned as special envoy, with the rank of minister plenipotentiary, to the republics of Chili, Peru, and Bolivia and will forthwith set out on his mission.

The commission which Mr. Trescot receives will not supersede the ordinary duties of yourself and your colleagues at Lima and La Paz; but all communications and negotiations connected with the settlement of the pending difficulties between Chili, Peru, and Bolivia, so far as this government may deem it judicious to take action, will be transferred to Mr. Trescot's charge.

Under the instructions which have been given to Mr. Trescot, he will place himself in direct communication with the several governments to which he is thus specially accredited. It is, however, expected that he will learn from you and your colleagues the exact condition of existing politicial relations, and receive such suggestions as your recent experience may enable you to submit for his consideration. The action he may take, however, must be decided upon his own responsibility, and in the exercise of his independent authority.

Mr. Trescot will be accompanied on this important mission by the Third Assistant Secretary of State. As it may be necessary to consult the representatives of the United States in Chili, Peru, and Bolivia at the same time, or to conduct a simultaneous negotiation with those governments, Mr. Trescot is empowered by the President of the United States to authorize Mr. Walker Blaine to represent the United States at any point where this necessity may occur.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

SIR: You will receive herewith your commission as special envoy with the rank of minister plenipotentiary to the republics of Chili, Peru, and Bolivia. This commission will not supersede the ordinary duties of the ministers plenipotentiary and resident now accredited to those governments. But, as they will be duly informed, all communications and negotiations connected with the settlement of the pending difficulties between Chili, Peru, and Bolivia, so far as this government may deem it judicious to take action, will be transferred to your charge. Under the instructions which will be furnished, you will place yourself in direct communication with those governments; but it is expected, as I am sure you would desire, that you should learn from the United States ministers now there the exact condition of existing political relations, and that you will give due regard to such suggestions as their recent experience enables them to submit to your consideration. Whatever action, however, you may take, must be decided upon your own responsibility, and will be in the exercise of your independent authority.

After full consideration of your suggestion that it may be necessary to conduct the same negotiation at more than one point, the President has directed the Third Assistant Secretary of State to accompany you. Should the occasion which you anticipate arise, you are authorized to give Mr. Blaine the necessary instructions; his official rank in the department, and his detail for special service on this mission being sufficient to authorize him, without a formal commission, to execute your instructions.

Your expenses, and those of the Third Assistant Secretary who accompanies you going and returning, and such as are incidental to your residence in South America and the mission upon which you are sent, will be allowed by this Department, in the confidence that with due regard to the proprieties of your position and the duties with which you are charged, these expenses will be reasonably and carefully regulated.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE

No. 107.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Walker Blaine.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 30, 1881.

SIR: You are aware that the President has deemed it proper to send a special mission to Chili, Peru, and Bolivia, and that the Hon. William Henry Trescot, of South Carolina, has been appointed special envoy.

As it is probable that the contemplated negotiations will have to be conducted at the same time at different points, you will, by direction of the President of the United States, be attached to this mission, on special service, with your official rank as Third Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Trescot is authorized to empower you to represent the government in any of the countries named, should the necessity occur, under such instructions as he shall give you, and he is directed, in case of his own absence, to place the mission under your charge during such absence.

While with Mr. Trescot, you will render such assistance in the discharge of his duties as he may require.

As you are already a salaried officer of the United States, no compensation can be given you beyond the repayment of your proper and necessary expenses, for which you will render an account, with such vouchers as may be obtainable, such account to be audited by the Secretary of State.

You will, in the course of your special service, communicate freely with the Department, by telegraph and in cipher, when practicable and requisite; and you will from time to time receive such instructions as may be necessary.

The Secretary of the Navy has directed the commanders of our national vessels on the South American Pacific coast to assist Mr. Trescot's movements and yours in all possible ways. To this end, a vessel of war will await your arrival at Panama.

Trusting that the success of this mission will meet the confident expectations of the President and of this Department,

I am, sir, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

No. 108.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Trescot.

No. 2.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 1, 1881.

SIR: While the circumstances under which the President has deemed it proper to charge you with a special mission to the republics of Chili, Peru, and Bolivia render it necessary that very much must be confided to your own discretion, it is desirable that you should be placed in full possession of his views as to the general line of conduct which you will be expected to pursue.

For this purpose it is not necessary at present to go further back in the history of the unfortunate relations between Chili on the one hand and Peru and Bolivia on the other, than the time when the defeat of General Piérola, his abandonment of the capital and the coast and their occupation by the Chilian army seemed to have put an end to all responsible native government in Peru. Lima having been surrendered on the 19th January, 1881, Piérola driven across the mountains, the Chilian military occupation consolidated, and the Chilian Government refusing to recognize Piérola as representing the Government of Peru, it became absolutely necessary that some government should be established, if Peru was not to remain simply a military district of Chili.

On February 25, 1881, Mr. Christiancy, the United States minister at Lima, wrote this Department as follows:

A movement has, therefore, been initiated among some of the leading citizens of Lima and Callao and encouraged by the Chilian authorities, to establish a new government in opposition to that of Piérola [who is still at Tacna or Yareja].

From this date to April 13, 1881, Mr. Christiancy kept the Department informed of the probabilities of the establishment of the Calderon government, so called from the name of the eminent Peruvian statesman who had been chosen as President. On that date he wrote:

In my own private opinion, however, if the provisional government had come up without any appearance of support from the Chilian authorities, it would have had many elements of popularity and would probably have succeeded in obtaining the acquiescence of the people. This new government realizes the importance of an early peace with Chili, the necessity of which must be recognized by every thoughtful man; while that of Piérola professes to intend to carry on the war; but it has no means for the purpose at present, and my own opinion is that any effort to do so will end in still greater calamities to Peru.

On May 23, the same minister, in a postscript to his dispatch of the 17th says:

Since writing the above it has become still more probable that the threat of "indefinite occupation" was intended only to drive the Peruvians into the support of the provisional government, as two days ago they allowed the government to send seventy-five soldiers to Tacna, Oroyo, &c., to control that part of the country, so as to allow the members of Congress to come to Lima; and it now begins to look as if Calderon might secure a quorum (two-thirds) of the Congress. If he does succeed, it will be some evidence that Peru acquiesces in that government. And if he gets the two-thirds of the members, I think I shall recognize the provisional government, or that of the Congress and the President they may elect, unless in the mean time I shall receive other instructions.

On the 9th of May, 1881, instructions had been sent to him from the Department, which crossed this dispatch, in which he was told:

If the Calderon government is supported by the character and intelligence of Peru, and is really endeavoring to restore constitutional government with a view both to order within and negotiations with Chili for peace, you may recognize it as the existing provisional government, and render what aid you can by advice and good offices to that end.

Acting under these instructions, although with some expressed doubt as to the probable permanence of its existence, Mr. Christiancy, on the 26th of June, 1881, formally recognized the Calderon government. It is clear that this recognition was not an unfriendly intervention as far as the wishes and interests of Chili were concerned, for under date of May 7, 1881, two days before these instructions of the 9th were sent to Mr. Christiancy, Mr. Osborn, the United States minister to Chili, wrote from Santiago as follows:

In my 201, of date April 5, regarding the war in this section, I mentioned the fact that the minister of war, Mr. Vergara, who had been with the army at Lima, had been sent for, and was then on his way to Chili. Since his arrival the government has labored to reach a conclusion touching the course to be pursued with Peru, and to that end numerous and extended discussions among the ministers and prominent citizens of the republic, who had been invited to participate, have taken place. Three plans or propositions were discussed: First, that spoken of by me in my No. 201, involving the withdrawal of the army to Arica; second, the occupation of the entire Peruvian coast by the Chilian forces, and its government by Chilian authorities; and third, the strengthening of the government of Calderon, and the negotiation of a peace therewith. The propriety of entering into negotiations with Piérola was not even dignified with a consideration. After much labor the government reached the conclusion that the last proposition afforded the easiest way out of their complications, and it has been determined to send to Peru, in charge of the negotiations, Mr. Godoy. * * * The ministry has freely counseled with me regarding the difficulties of the situation, and in view of their previous determination to have nothing to do with Piérola, I cannot but applaud the result of their deliberations. To vacate the country now would be to turn it over to anarchy, and to attempt to occupy the entire coast would, in time, involve both countries in ruin. The most feasible way to peace is, in my opinion, the one resolved upon. In fact it is the only one which offers any reasonable hope of a solution of the difficulties during the present generation.

In giving the support of recognition to the Calderon government, therefore, so far was this government from doing what could be considered an unfriendly act to Chili, that it was, in fact, giving its aid to the very policy which Chili avowed, and which, in the opinion of competent judges, was the only method of reasonable solution.

And this conclusion of the government was strengthened and confirmed by the information which was transmitted to the Department by General Kilpatrick, the United States minister to Chili. General Kilpatrick was appointed after the recognition of the Calderon government, and was furnished with instructions, to which I have already referred.

In his dispatch No. 3, under date August 15, 1881, he says:

I have the honor to report that, so far as the assurance of public men can be relied upon, your instructions have been complied with; your ideas of final terms of peace accepted, not only by the present administration at Santiago, but still better by Señor Santa Maria, the President elect, whose administration will have begun when you receive this note.

General Kilpatrick then proceeds to give a detailed account of a lengthy interview with the leading and most influential members of the Chilian Government, in which he quotes the following as the final assurances given to him by the Chilian secretary of state:

You may therefore say to your government that every effort would be given by Chili to strengthen the government of President Calderon, giving to it the most perfect freedom of action, considering the Chilian occupation. That no question of Chilian annexation would be touched until a constitutional government could be established in Peru, acknowledged and respected by the people, with full powers to enter into diplomatic negotiation for peace. That no territory would be exacted unless Chili failed to secure ample and just indemnification in other and satisfactory ways, as also ample security for the future; and that in no case would Chili exact territory save where Chilian enterprise and Chilian capital had developed the desert and where today nine-tenths of the people were Chilian.

But after this recognition, made in entire good faith to both parties, three things followed:

1. The presence of a United States minister at Lima accredited to the Calderon government, and the reception in Washington of a minister from that government, gave it, unquestionably, increased strength and confidence.

2. The adherents of Piérola, realizing the necessity of peace and the existence of a stable government to negotiate it, gradually abandoned the forlorn hope of continued resistance, and gave their adhesion to the Calderon government.

3. The congress which assembled within the neutral zone set apart for that purpose by the Chilian authorities, and which was further allowed by the Chilian Government to provide for the military impositions by the use of the national credit, and thus recognized as the representative of the Peruvian people, authorized President Calderon to negotiate a peace, but upon the condition that no territory should be ceded.

As soon as these facts indicated the possibility of a real and independent vitality in the constitution of the Calderon government the Chilian military authorities issued an order forbidding any exercise of its functions within the territory occupied by the Chilian army—that is, within the entire territory west of the mountains, including the capital and ports of Peru.

Unable to understand this sudden and, giving due regard to the professions of Chili, this unaccountable change of policy, this government intructed its minister at Lima to continue to recognize the Calderon government until more complete information would enable it to send further instructions. If our present information is correct, immediately upon the receipt of this communication they arrested President Calderon, and thus, as far as was in their power, extinguished his government. The President does not now insist upon the inference which this action would warrant. He hopes that there is some explanation which will relieve him from the painful impression that it was taken in resentful reply to the continued recognition of the Calderon government by the United States. If, unfortunately, he should be mistaken, and such a motive be avowed, your duty will be a brief one. You will say to the Chilian Government that the President considers such a proceeding as an intentional and unwarranted offense, and that you will communicate such an avowal to the Government of the United States, with the assurance that it will be regarded by the government as an act of such unfriendly import as to require the immediate suspension of all diplomatic intercourse. You will inform me immediately of the happening of such a contingency and instructions will be sent you.

But I do not anticipate such an occurrence. From the information before the Department, of which you are possessed, it is more probable that this course will be explained by an allegation that the conduct and language of the United States minister in Peru had encouraged the Calderon government to such resistance of the wishes of Chili as to render the negotiation of a satisfactory treaty of peace with the Calderon government impossible. Any explanation which relieves this action of the Chilian Government of the character of an intentional offense will be received by you to that extent, provided it does not require as a condition precedent the disavowal of Mr. Hurlbut. Whatever may be my opinion as to the discretion of all that may have been said or done by Mr. Hurlbut, it is impossible for me to recognize the right of the Chilian Government to take such action without submitting to the consideration of this government any cause of complaint which it was prepared to allege against the proceedings of the representative of the United States. The Chilian Government was in possession of the instructions sent to that minister, as well as those to his colleague at Santiago. There was no pretense that the conduct of General Kilpatrick was anything but friendly. Chili was represented here by a minister who enjoyed the confidence of his government, and nothing can justify the assumption that the United States was acting a double part in its relations to the two countries. If the conduct of the United States minister seemed inconsistent with what Chili had every reason to know was the friendly intention of the United States, a courteous representation through the Chilian minister here would have enabled this government promptly to correct or confirm him. You are not therefore authorized to make to the Chilian Government any explanation of the conduct of General Hurlbut, if that government, not having afforded us the opportunity of accepting or disavowing his conduct, insists upon making its interpretation of his proceedings the justification of its recent action.

It is hoped, however, that you will be able, by communication, at once firm and temperate, to avoid these embarrassments. If you should fortunately reach the ground where frank, mutual explanation can be made without the sacrifice of that respect which every government owes to itself, you will then be at liberty, conforming your explanation to the recent instruction to Mr. Hurlbut, with a copy of which you are furnished, to show to the Government of Chili how much both his words and acts have been misconceived.

It is difficult for me to say now how far an explanation would be satisfactory to the President which was not accompanied by the restoration or recognition of the Calderon government. The objects which he has at heart are, first, to prevent the misery, confusion, and bloodshed which the present relations between Chili and Peru seem only too certain to renew; and, second, to take care that in any friendly attempt to reach this desirable end the Government of the United States is treated with the respectful consideration to which its disinterested purpose, its legitimate influence, and its established position entitle it. The President feels in this matter neither irritation nor resentment. He regrets that Chili seems to have misconceived both the spirit and intention of the Government of the United States, and thinks her conduct has been inconsiderate. He will gladly learn that a calmer and wiser judgment directs her counsels, and asks in no exacting spirit the correction of what were perhaps natural misunderstandings. So he would be satisfied with the manifestation of a sincere purpose on the part of Chili to aid Peru, either in restoring the present provisional government or establishing in its place one which will be allowed the proper freedom of action necessary to restore internal order and to conduct a real negotiation to some substantial result.

Should the Chilian Government, while disclaiming any intention of offense, maintain its right to settle its difficulties with Peru without the friendly intervention of other powers, and refuse to allow the formation of any government in Peru which does not pledge its consent to the cession of Peruvian territory, it will be your duty, in language as strong as is consistent with the respect due an independent power, to express the disappointment and dissatisfaction felt by the United States at such a deplorable policy.

You will say that this government recognizes without reserve the right of Chili to adequate indemnity for the cost of the war, and a sufficient guarantee that it will not again be subjected to hostile demonstration from Peru; and further, that if Peru is unable or unwilling to furnish such indemnity, the right of conquest has put it in the power of Chili to supply them, and the reasonable exercise of that right, however much its necessity may be regretted, is not ground of legitimate complaint on the part of other powers. But this government feels that the exercise of the right of absolute conquest is dangerous to the best interests of all the republics of this continent; that from it are certain to spring other wars and political disturbances; and that it imposes, even upon the conqueror, burdens which are scarcely compensated by the apparent increase of strength which it gives. This government also holds that between two independent nations hostilities do not, from the mere existence of war, confer the right of conquest until the failure to furnish the indemnity and guarantee which can be rightfully demanded.

The United States maintains, therefore, that Peru has the right to demand that an opportunity should be allowed her to find such indemnity and guarantee. Nor can this government admit that a cession of territory can be properly exacted far exceeding in value the amplest estimate of a reasonable indemnity.

Already, by force of its occupation, the Chilian Government has collected great sums from Peru; and it has been openly and officially asserted in the Chilian Congress that these military impositions have furnished a surplus beyond the cost of maintaining its armies in that occupation. The annexation of Tarapacá, which, under proper administration, would produce annually a sum sufficient to pay a large indemnity, seems to us to be not consistent with the execution of justice.

The practical prohibition of the formation of a stable government in Peru, and the absolute appropriation of its most valuable territory, is simply the extinction of a State which has formed part of the system of republics on this continent, honorable in the traditions and illustrations of its past history, and rich in the resources for future progress. The United States, with which Peru has for many years maintained the most cordial relations, has the right to feel and express a deep interest in its distressed condition; and while with equal friendliness to Chili we will not interpose to deprive her of the fair advantages of military success, nor put any obstacle to the attainment of future security, we cannot regard with unconcern the destruction of Peruvian nationality. If our good offices are rejected, and this policy of the absorption of an independent state be persisted in, this government will consider itself discharged from any further obligation to be influenced in its action by the position which Chili has assumed, and will hold itself free to appeal to the other republics of this continent to join it in an effort to avert consequences which cannot be confined to Chili and Peru, but which threaten with extremest danger the political institutions, the peaceful progress, and the liberal civilization of all America.

If, however, none of these embarrassing obstacles supervene, and Chili receives in a friendly spirit the representations of the United States, it will be your purpose—

First. To concert such measures as will enable Peru to establish a regular government, and initiate negotiation.

Second. To induce Chili to consent to such negotiation without cession of territory as a condition precedent.

Third. To impress upon Chili that in such negotiation she ought to allow Peru a fair opportunity to provide for a reasonable indemnity; and, in this connection, to let it be understood that the United States would consider the imposition of an extravagant indemnity, so as to make the cession of territory necessary in satisfaction, as more than is justified by the actual cost of the war, and as a solution threatening renewed difficulty between the two countries.

As it is probable that some time will elapse before the completion of all the arrangements necessary for a final negotiation, this government would suggest a temporary convention, which, recognizing the spirit of our present friendly representation, would bring Peru and Chili into amicable conference and provide for a meeting of plenipotentiaries to negotiate a permanent treaty of peace.

If negotiation be assured, the ability of Peru to furnish the indemnity will be a matter of direct interest. Upon this subject we have no information upon which definite instructions can now be based. While you will carefully abstain from any interposition in this connection, you will examine and report to this department promptly any plans which may be suggested.

You will not indicate any wish that the Government of the United States should act as umpire in the adjudications between the contending powers. Should an invitation to that effect be extended, you will communicate by telegraph for instructions. The single and simple desire of this government is to see a just and honorable peace at the earliest day practicable, and if any other American government can more effectively aid in producing this auspicious result, the United States will cordially sustain it and lend such co-operation as the circumstances may demand.

I am, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

No. 109.

Mr. Kilpatrick to Mr. Blaine.

No. 9.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago, Chili, December 2, 1881. (Received January 4, 1882.)

SIR: Had I been able, I would, at the time the Government of Chili determined to arrest and suspend the functions of the government of Calderon, have given you the reasons as they are placed in my possession by the secretary of state, and everything done to preserve good faith as to promises made me here on the part of the government. But for four months I have been very ill; for the last two months at the point of death, unable even to write my own name. I am now just able to sit up, and for your information and on behalf of the honor and good faith of Chili I make this brief statement.

Chili guaranteed through me to demand no annexation of territory from Peru as an absolute condition of peace. This was done at your request. She agreed to demand no territory if security for future peace and safe and satisfactory indemnification could be secured otherwise, and in no case to annex territory save where a large majority of the actual residents were citizens of Chili and foreigners. She agreed to build up and strengthen the government of Calderon if possible, and, if possible, to make it respectable, constitutional, stable, a government with which she could treat for peace. These pledges were made in good faith and would have been fulfilled; but our new minister at Lima arrived. Whether true or false, he has the reputation of having impressed the government of Calderon and the people of Peru with the idea that the Government of the United States would not permit annexation of Peruvian territory to Chili under any circumstances. This was published and talked of. He, himself, emphasized this in his letter to the government of Piérola. He sent messages to the Argentine Republic urging them to send a minister at once to check the power of Chili. The whole conduct of Calderon, befriended and sustained by Chili, changed; and he is openly accused now by the Government of Chili of having without authority flooded the country with his own paper currency, of having gathered and collected arms, and of having organized secret forces, and finally of having placed himself in communication with the belligerent forces of Piérola, Montero, and Sola, and the Government of Bolivia, still in open arms against Chili, now threatening her outposts, and cutting, from time to time, her lines of communication. And so far had he succeeded that the department of Arequipa had proclaimed for him, and a promise made on the part of our own minister at Lima to said belligerents, that the Government of the United States would forcibly resist the disintegration of Peru and had determined to maintain and sustain the government of President Calderon.

These are the facts as given to me by the administration here to justify them in the course they have pursued. The arrival of your messenger with special and unknown instructions is beginning to create an excitement here and a resentment against the United States that will not be easily calmed. Chili has looked upon our country as its greatest friend; has been willing to make many sacrifices to comply with your requests; but now, in view of the course pursued at Lima, the threatening claims of some great Peruvian company professing to be backed by the Department at Washington, of which I send you a copy marked A, is creating an alarm and excitement here such as has never existed in Chili. I should like to give you details, but I am unable from extreme weakness to dictate another sentence.

Yours truly,

J. KILPATRICK.

THE PERUVIAN COMPANY,
10 Spruce Street, New York, October 19, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith official printed copies of communications on behalf of this company to the minister of Peru and Chili at Washington.

Duplicates of these inclosures were filed in the Department of State on the 11th instant, and the originals were personally delivered by * * * our counsel at Washington, on the 13th.

I place these copies in your hands, of course, without comment, and only for your early information. I have reason to suppose that you will receive instructions concerning the interests involved at an early day.

It may be proper to add that this company is now fully organized, with a capital of $250,000,000; that it includes the best legal, diplomatic, and money resources of the United States; that the title upon which it relies is approved unanimously by a large staff of eminent counsel, and that it has unqualified assurance of ample governmental backing. It has called for the property, and you may safely rely that it has at command every means of enforcing that call. I send you a recent copy of the Times, which does but reflect the average public sentiment here. All the papers (preliminary) in the case I sent to your address in this city before you sailed.

We are prepared to treat Chili fairly, even liberally, but only on condition that she recognizes our superior rights. If she raises an issue she will simply get nothing. Right must rule.

Your obedient servant,

JACOB R SHIPHERD.

SIR: It is not impossible that before the close of the special mission, instructions for which have been already furnished you, it may be deemed advisable that at its close you should return to the United States by way of the Argentine Confederation and Brazil.

Positive instructions may be sent you to this effect before your mission closes, but at present my purpose is to advise you of such possible contingency, and to add that if at the close of the special mission you should decide that a return home by the way of Buenos Ayres and Rio de Janeiro was advisable, you are hereby authorized without waiting for such instructions to return home by that way.

Should you do so, you will in your communications with the representatives of the Governments of Brazil and the Argentine Confederation impress upon them the advantages which would result from a full and frank conference between all the republics of North and South America. By the time you can reach these points the opinions of this government on this subject will have been formally submitted to them, and you will have the opportunity to enforce these views and to direct their attention to the importance of the proposed congress.

If you will telegraph the probable time of your arrival at Buenos Ayres, a vessel of the United States will meet you at that place.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Trescot.

No. 4.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 16, 1881.

SIR: Some erroneous statements, now being circulated in a portion of the American press, may reach Santiago and create an injurious impression in the minds of the Chilian Government; and I write you this instruction from excess of caution, in order that no enduring harm may result.

The erroneous statements in the press to which I especially refer are those which represent this government as in some way giving encouragement to the Cochet claim against Peru, which, being acknowledged, should enable the United States to pay an indemnity to Chili and then practically own Peru, either directly or through an association of American citizens.

This is the extreme statement, and it has many shadings and variations.

You will take prompt and special care to anticipate any evil that might result from these rumors being circulated by a disavowal and denial of them in whole and in any part.

The only claim for which this Department has instructed our minister at Lima to use his good offices is that known as the Landreau claim, and this to the extent only of insisting that Mr. Landreau should be permitted to have an authoritative investigation of his claim by the Peruvian Government, and that if found to be good and valid it should be provided for in any treaty with Chili which might affect the property to which it attaches.

The law officer of the Department of State, as long ago as 1874, made an exhaustive report on this claim, and recommended that this government should interpose its good offices in behalf thereof.

On the 20th of July, 1874, my predecessor, Mr. Secretary Fish, instructed our minister at Lima to use his good offices with the Peruvian authorities in behalf of Mr. John C. Landreau, "with a view of securing from that government a speedy investigation and adjustment of his claim."

On the 20th day of February, 1880, the House of Representatives of the last Congress unanimously passed the following resolution:

That the petition of John C. Landreau, the report made thereon by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the accompanying papers be transmitted to the Executive Department, with the request that the President take such steps as, in his opinion, may be proper, and in accordance with international law to secure to the said John C. Landreau a final settlement and adjustment of his claim against the Government of Peru; and that, if in his opinion it is proper to do so, the President invite the Government of France to co-operate with the United States in this behalf.

I inclose herewith, for your further information, copies of my instructions to Mr. Hurlbut on this subject. It gives me pleasure to say in this connection, that Mr. Hurlbut's action in regard to both the Landreau and Cochet claims has been marked by entire prudence and discretion.

While disabusing the mind of the Chilian Government of any impression that the United States meditates intervention on behalf of private claims, beyond the use of its good offices, you will say that justice seems to demand that Landreau should have an opportunity to be heard in support of his claim before a tribunal in Peru competent to decide it, and that, if decided in his favor, a treaty of peace which might cede territory to Chili should not be made in disregard of any rights which Mr. Landreau may be found, after an impartial judicial investigation, to possess.

Further than this the Department of State has not felt authorized to go, and I must express the hope that the Governments of Peru and Chili, to both of which you are accredited, will recognize the moderation and justice of the request made by this government.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI,
MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, November 11, 1880.

In a separate note I acquaint you with the result of a conference held at Arica by reason of the mediation which the Government of the United States of North America was pleased to offer to the belligerents.

Although the result of those conferences has not borne out the noble object which the Government of the United States had in view, the sentiment of sincere gratitude which its fraternal and elevated policy has awakened in the Government and people of Chili is none the less lively.

I must likewise add that its noble policy has been faithfully and ably interpreted by the Hon. Mr. Osborn in all this negotiation, and that the delicate tact, rectitude of views, and elevated spirit of which he has given unmistakable proof, have strengthened the confidence and esteem with which from the first he has inspired this government and country.

You will take an early opportunity of signifying these sentiments to the Government of the United States, leaving a copy of this dispatch if any suggestion be made in that sense.

May God guard you.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI,
MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
November 22, 1880.

SIR: In a separate note I acquaint you with the result of the conference of Arica, which took place through the medium of the friendly co-operation of the Government of the United States.

This result cannot have been satisfactory, I am convinced, to that government, which had desired, as that of Chili desired, that its intervention in this delicate matter should have been accompanied by the most complete results.

For this reason I consider it necessary to set forth to you, in all frankness, the causes which induced the Government of Chili to accept the good offices of the United States, in the conviction that its noble efforts would not be barren of result.

My government very well realizes the important part which the policy of the United States justly plays in the international movements of the whole world. But before accepting its high mediation in the affairs of the Pacific, it was thought proper that the necessary precautions should be taken, in order to feel assured that its good offices would reach the desired result. With this purpose in view, my government was careful to express, with all frankness, that it could not for its part arrive at a peace without the cession by Peru and Bolivia of the territories which extend to the south of Camarones as an equitable compensation for the enormous expenses and sacrifices which have been demanded of it by the present war.

This same declaration was made by His Excellency the President of the Republic to Mr. Christiancy, in the presence of Mr. Osborn, when the former came from Lima, toward the end of August last. His Excellency the President stated moreover to Mr. Christiancy, on that occasion, that his demand in this respect was absolute and final, so that it would be futile to take any steps in the direction of realizing the projected conference suggested by the Government of the United States without first obtaining the assurance that the allied governments would accept the prior condition proposed.

Mr. Christiancy, who came from Lima, and who, it was natural to suppose, would be impressed by the views of the Peruvian Government, declares in the most unmistakable and positive manner that he was persuaded that the Government of Peru would agree to the cession of territory which Chili demanded, and that therefore the conference would yield the peaceful results which the United States aimed at.

Although Mr. Christiancy was not accredited to my government, he did not for that reason cease to be a representative of the United States, in whose affirmations faith should be reposed, in view especially of the great importance of the affair which gave rise to them.

In naming its plenipotentiaries, my government confided in the assurances given by Mr. Christiancy, and cherished well-founded hope that the conference would give a happy result.

You are already aware that Peru refused absolutely any cession of territory, and that the result of the conference did not correspond to the assurances of Mr. Christiancy.

My government considers that it could not better respond to the fraternal spirit of which the United States have given it such proofs than by declaring with sincerity, as it now does, that the failure of this conference is in no wise to be imputed to any action on the part of Chili.

I desire that you will seek a fitting occasion to give to the Government of the United States confidential knowledge of this dispatch.

May God guard you.

REPUBLIC OF CHILI,
MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, November 22, 1880.

SIR: Referring to the dispatch of this date, No. 29, I think it opportune to make mention of other facts connected with the strange attitude assumed by Mr. Christiancy during the preliminary negotiations which preceded the holding of the conference of Arica.

You know that in our country, as in Peru and Bolivia, the national sentiment is extremely susceptible, and is profoundly affected by any act or demonstration which is capable of being regarded as a disregard, even though involuntary, of the considerations due to the national dignity.

Knowing these sentiments, the Government of the United States endeavored with great delicacy to learn privately, and through the medium of its respective diplomatic agents, what would be the disposition of the belligerents respecting the acceptance of the mediation of the United States.

The spirit which led it to proceed in this manner was most obvious; on the one hand, a desire to be assured of the success of its conciliatory attempts, and, on the other hand, to find itself in a condition to make simultaneously to the belligerents the formal offer of its mediation. In this way it perfectly safe-guarded the natural delicacy of the three countries.

In the high character of mediator and common friend which the United States proposed to assume, it became an object of especial attention to treat the belligerents with identical consideration. It was therefore indispensable that the necessary precautions should be taken so that no one of them should appear as taking the first step toward asking or seeking for peace.

Mr. Osborn seconded most faithfully, in our judgment, the noble policy of his government. The 5th of August last, he began by inquiring privately, in an interview what would be the disposition of my government with respect to the mediation which the United States proposed to offer.

The reply given on the 10th of the same month informs Mr. Osborn that Chili would have no objection to accepting it, provided that it had the assurances of equal acceptance on the part of the allies.

Two months later, that is to say, on the 6th of October, Mr. Osborn, for the first time, offered to my government, as you may see by the accompanying copy No. 1, the formal mediation of the United States, and on the 7th, as appears in copy No. 2, he received the reply, in which the Government of Chili informed him that his offer of mediation was accepted on our part.

Meanwhile, in the time which elapsed between the conversation held with Mr. Osborn, in the early part of August, and the formal offer of mediation which was made in the beginning of October, Mr. Christiancy thought it proper to come from Lima to Santiago, where he remained several days, toward the end of August, in order to be able to return in safety to that capital. The unexpected appearance of Mr. Christiancy in Chili could not fail, however, to attract attention, causing the very general impression that the sudden voyage of the American minister was intimately related to the question of mediation.

The disquietude which was occasioned expressed itself in Congress, wherein my government was interpolated touching this matter, about the middle of September.

The government responded, stating what had theretofore occurred in the premises, that is to say, that there did not exist any formal proposal of mediation, since there had merely been exchanged with the minister of the United States, Mr. Osborn, certain views in a private form concerning the projected office of mediation.

A few days later the journals of Lima published a note from the foreign minister of Peru, dated the 14th September, and addressed to Mr. Christiancy. In this note occurred the following:

> Informed by you concerning your voyage to Santiago de Chili, to which place you had gone with the object of proposing to the government of that republic the mediation of the United States of America, in order to negotiate a peace with Peru and Bolivia, a mediation which had been accepted by Chili, in virtue whereof you proposed it to my government, the latter resolved, after conferring with the minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Bolivia, to accept the offered mediation, &c.

It is seen, therefore, by the paragraph I have quoted, that at the same time that my government declared, toward the middle of September, in the chamber of deputies, that up to that time the mediation in question had not been formally accepted, nor even officially offered, Mr. Christiancy was affirming, in his turn to the Government of Peru, that he had come to our country for the purpose of offering it to my government, and that in view of the acceptance given by this government, he made a like offer to the government of that republic.

The affirmations made by my government before one of the branches of the legislative body, and the affirmations of Mr. Christiancy to the Government of Peru, are altogether irreconcilable.

It does not appertain to me to qualify herein the motives which Mr. Christiancy may have obeyed in making such a declaration. My purpose is simply limited to setting upon record that the affirmations of my government rested faithfully upon the truth.

Mr. Christiancy did not present to my government credentials authorizing him to act either in respect of the projected mediation or in respect of any negotiation whatever. He was, therefore, in our country simply as a distinguished guest, and in no wise as the authorized organ of the government. If Mr. Christiancy had made, as he affirms, the offer of mediation, my government would have found itself under the painful necessity of rejecting such offer, because it did not conform to the usual practices between two nations; neither would it have been natural for the Government of the United States, which, with such delicate tact, had put forth its conciliatory efforts, to have set aside its official representative in Chili, Mr. Osborn, in order to confide the continuation of this delicate business to a simple visitor, worthy of all respect, but lacking toward us the representative character.

These well-founded considerations led my government to think that perhaps the note of the foreign minister of Peru might not faithfully express the ideas of Mr. Christiancy, and it has awaited until now, but in vain, a correction on the part of that high functionary, which would re-establish the truth of the facts.

Subsequently there came to the hands of my government a note which the same Mr. Christiancy deemed it proper to address to Mr. Lynch, chief of the Chilian expedition operating upon the north of Peru, and that note has confirmed, to a certain extent, the ideas which the minister of Peru attributes to Mr. Christiancy with respect to the form in which the mediation was offered. I inclose herewith, in copies designated as numbers 3, 4, and 5, the note of the minister of Peru to which I have made reference, and also the dispatches exchanged between Mr. Christiancy and Mr. Lynch. It is not for the present a part of my purpose to take note of the proceeding employed by the minister of the United States in addressing himself to a military employé of Chili, for the purpose of making representations to him, which, from the high source from which they emanated, might induce the chief of our forces to deviate from the instructions of his government. My purpose at this time is simply to inform you with precision of the various steps which preceded the conference of Arica.

You will take an opportunity to express these facts to the Government of the United States in confidential form.

May God guard you.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Chili, October 6, 1880.

SIR: Your excellency is aware that on the 6th of August last I approached the honorable President of the Republic of Chili with a view of learning whether the Government of Chili was disposed to enter into a conference with the ministers of the other belligerent republics in the present war, in order to reach an honorable peace under the mediation in the shape of good offices of the United States. Your excellency was pleased to inform me, in our interview of the 10th of August, that the government of Chili would accept the good offices of the United States in the suggested form, if Peru and Bolivia signified on their part their acceptance of this idea.

The conditions indicated by your excellency in this interview having been complied with, I now have the honor to offer formally to the government of your excellency the mediation of the Government of the United States, in order that it may be exercised in the proposed manner.

The form which I suggested in the interview alluded to had in view the celebration of a conference of the ministers duly authorized of the three belligerent republics on board of an American vessel of war, at Arica, in the presence and with the friendly aid and assistance of the representatives of the United States near the belligerent government.

With sentiments of high consideration I have the honor to be, sir, your excellency's most respectful and obedient servant,

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Santiago, October 7, 1880.

SIR: I have received the note which you were pleased to address to me under date of yesterday. After recalling therein the steps you have taken with a view to ascertaining if my government were disposed to enter upon the peace conference with the other belligerents under the mediation in the form of good offices of the United States, and recalling, also, the favorable disposition shown by my government provided that those of Peru and Bolivia should accept on their part a like suggestion, you inform me that this condition having been already complied with, the time has come to offer formally to the Government of Chili, as you now do, the mediation of the United States.

His Excellency the President of the Republic, to whose knowledge I have brought your dispatch, has charged me to convey to you the expression of his gratitude for the noble interest with which the Government of the United States endeavors to bring about the restoration of peace between Chili and the allied republics.

My government accepts the mediation in the form of good offices which you offer to me in the name of the United States, likewise the proceeding which you suggest to carry it into effect.

I must, before all, repeat here, in order to avoid doubts and ambiguities, that this acceptance does not involve the suspension of all hostilities.

I improve this opportunity to renew to you the sentiments of high consideration with which I have the honor to subscribe myself.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS AND WORSHIP,
Lima, September 14, 1880.

Mr. MINISTER: Informed by your excellency respecting your voyage to Santiago de Chili, to which place you went for the purpose of proposing to the government of that republic the mediation of the United States of America, in order to negotiate peace with Peru and Bolivia, which mediation had been accepted by Chili, and in virtue of which you proposed the same to my government, the latter decided, after conferring with the minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Bolivia, to accept the offered mediation solely in deference to the Government of the United States, and notwithstanding that the motives of the war declared by Chili, which took Peru by surprise, and the manner in which it has been conducted from the first had convinced us how far Chili was from the path of moderation and justice, the sole path in which peace is possible, as I had the honor to say to you in a verbal conference on this business.

The acts which the Chilian forces have, notwithstanding, done at more than 100 leagues from our army, and from any objective military point, acts of pillage, incendiarism, devastation, and all manner of outrages against private property of natives and foreigners, especially after having accepted the mediation of the government of your excellency, if not compatible with the consideration which is due to the friendly mediator, cannot but confirm that presumption, awakening a spirit of indignation difficult to control. My government confines itself to expressing that sentiment, leaving to that of your excellency and to your excellency yourself the due appreciation of such conduct. My government thinks that if the love of peace and the consideration which it feels for the government and people of the United States can decide it, notwithstanding the evident justice of its cause and its complete confidence in the final result of the war, and the injuries and losses sustained, to enter upon negotiations for peace, it is natural that such motives should be entirely destroyed by the actual and melancholy evidence that we are contending with those who in such manner violate the laws of civilization and the respect which cultured people owe to themselves.

It is pleasing to me to avail myself of this opportunity to offer to your excellency my considerations of especial esteem.

MANUEL A. BARINAGA.

[Inclosure No. 4.—Translation.]

Mr. Christiancy to the commander of the Chilian forces.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, September 13, 1880.

SIR: I have just arrived from Santiago, where, in company with the American minister, Mr. Osborn, I had a full and free conference with the Government of Chili, which has accepted the mediation of the United States, in order to negotiate peace with Peru and Bolivia. I am now authorized to say that Peru accepts such mediation, and that the negotiations for peace will be immediately undertaken. When I conferred with the Government of Chili I was not authorized to say that Peru would accept the mediation of the United States, but now I am authorized to say that Peru accepts it and that the ambassadors of all the belligerents will meet for this purpose in the early days of the coming month of October.

I do not interfere, nor can I pretend to interfere, with the instructions which you may have from your government concerning the steps which you have been ordered to take, but I hope that you will appreciate my representations, and those of the government which I represent, which is equally the friend of all the belligerents, if I suggest to you that, in so far as your orders permit, it would be prudent and would contribute to obtain a speedy peace and avoid all destruction and causes of irritation which may not be rendered obligatory by the orders you have; and I permit myself to add that there is a very marked sentiment, as I know, among the ministers of the foreign governments, both here and in Santiago, against the destruction of purely private property which is not demanded by the military necessity of attacking the armed forces of the enemy and against accepting contributions from them, and especially because such destructions may be committed or such contributions imposed upon the private property which is known to belong to the citizens of friendly and neutral nations, and from which proceedings, as you will readily comprehend, may arise many complications and complaints. The government of Chili will be immediately informed that Peru has accepted the friendly mediation of the United States, and of its readiness to enter upon negotiation upon such auspices.

If I had been able, when I was in Santiago, to assure the Government of Chili of the readiness of Peru to enter upon negotiations in which Chili should take part, I would feel inclined to believe that if the Chilian expedition had been about to depart it would have been under orders somewhat modified and less severe than those which you now probably have, but I cannot ask you to adopt my opinion, and recognize entirely the fact that you must act in view of your own judgment of the circumstances and as the orders of your government demand.

Permit me to conclude by expressing to your excellency the respect and high consideration with which I subscribe myself your excellency's friend and obedient servant,

I. P. CHRISTIANCY.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE CHILIAN DIVISION IN THE NORTH OF PERU,
On board the Itata. September 17, 1880.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your polite notes of the 13th and 14th instant, in which your excellency is pleased to bring to my knowledge the laudable efforts which have been made towards the belligerent governments for the purpose of bringing about an honorable peace between them, through the medium of the mediation of the Government of the United States, of which your excellency is the worthy representative at Lima.

Your excellency, in making known to me what has been done to that end, and what is hoped for from the good offices (of the United States) has been pleased to indicate to me the conduct, which, in your judgment, I should follow in the military operations which my government has confided to me, in view of the good will with which the belligerent governments have accepted the mediation of that of your excellency.

It would have been very gratifying to me, Mr. Minister, to accept your manner of thinking if I had not been informed to-day by the commanding officer of our squadron, that the Government of Peru is continuing its operations against the vessels of the Chilian navy.

The repetition of such insidious attempts on the part of that government, at the time when your excellency assures me of the desire it expresses to negotiate for peace, convinces me that its purpose is not genuine.

For this reason I see no well-founded motive for suspending the military operations which have been confided to me in the absence of a special instruction from my government.

So far as concerns respect for the property of neutrals, which your excellency is pleased to recommend to me in the notes, which I have the honor to answer, your excellency may rest assured that I will proceed in conformity with the prescriptions of international law.

In conclusion, I beg your excellency to accept the high esteem with which I subscribe myself your obedient servant,

PATRICIO LYNCH.

LEGATION OF CHILI,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1881.

ESTEEMED SIR AND FRIEND: The New York papers are publishing a rumor that it is possible that Chili may establish a protectorate over Peru, because that country cannot form a government of its own, and because many sensible people are asking for such a protectorate.

I am sorry that I cannot call and speak with Mr. Blaine personally on this subject. Nevertheless I desire to inform him, through you, that there is no ground whatever for such rumor; and that, even though all the Peruvians should clamor for a protectorate, Chili would on no account consent to establish one.

With sentiments of highest esteem, &c.,

LEGATION OF CHILI,
Washington, October 24, 1881.

SIR: To-morrow, or the day after, I shall have the pleasure to call on you in order to deliver two autograph letters from the President of Chili.

In the mean time I allow myself to inclose some articles published in some of the newspapers, which will let you know the political course which Minister Hurlbut has been pursuing in Peru.

The New York Herald published the letter written by Mr. Hurlbut to Garcia y Garcia, Piérola's only minister, in which he decisively declares that Peru will never yield any portion of her territory to Chili.

Other paper, cut out from the National Republican of this city, contains a communication relating to the clandestine or fraudulent emission of bank-notes emitted by Garcia Calderon, and which compelled General Lynch to act in the manner that I spoke of in our last intercourse.

The third article, published in the New York Evening Post, is very sensibly written and in which Mr. Hurlbut's diplomatic conduct is very accurately criticised.

I have also a copy in Spanish of the letter addressed by Minister Hurlbut to General Lynch, after the occupation of the fiscal office of Garcia Calderon. This letter is written more or less in the same sense as that addressed to Garcia y Garcia.

With sentiments of my highest consideration, &c.,

M. MARTINEZ.

[Extract from New York Herald.]

GENERAL HURLBUT'S LETTER.

The following is a translation from the Spanish of the original letter written in English by General Hurlbut, the United States minister here, to Don Aurelio Garcia y Garcia, secretary-general of Don Nicolas de Piérola. The letter was intended to be private, and, indeed, is only from one gentleman to another; but the government here found it so pleasing and so much to the point, that its publicity in Lima to-day is owing to such partiality. When Mr. Hurlbut penned the communication he never thought it would see the light in Lima. To say that it has caused a sensation would be to underrate the truth, and the truth contained in it cannot be controverted:

LIMA, September 12, 1881.

TO AURELIO GARCIA Y GARCIA, Esq.,
Ayacucho:

SIR: I have the honor to own receipt of your letter dated August 28 last. In answer allow me to observe that I hardly consider it proper to discuss the internal affairs of Peru, if not replying to some formal and proper invitation to do so. But since yours gives me an opportunity to express to you particularly my frank opinion, I shall so proceed, and at the same time employing all the kindness possible. It is an accepted fact that ours is a republic, governed by a constitution which is regarded as the supreme law. Mr. Piérola took possession of the reins of power and arrogated to himself an authority not recognized by that constitution; these were acts in themselves revolutionary and contrary to the true obedience required by law. The violent and compulsory manner by which that revolution was effected stamped the act itself as being a crime against liberty. The dictatorship was nothing but an autocratic and despotic tyranny, not only in its plan, but in its name and actions. While it lasted the constitutional government of Peru was overwhelmed by the will of one man, which replaced the laws and the regimen of the constitution. The people of Peru, in the midst of the perplexities of a war of invasion, accepted this autocracy, believing that victory was to be achieved under its banners.

Foreign nations acknowledged this power as a government de facto, but never gave their approval to either its origin or the system followed. Instead of victory, the dictatorship brought as result terrible defeats, and the Dictator fled from the capital. The people of Peru have not had since that moment an opportunity to freely express their will and sympathy. According to the constitution, the National Assembly—the minister refers to that of Ayacucho—has no right to exist, and its resolutions or laws have no more legal weight than the opinions expressed by a similar number of simple citizens. Therefore the confirmation of the full and autocratic faculties given to the ex-dictator, under his new title of President, confer no further validity in the eyes of the law to his authority and pretensions.

I am obliged, for this reason, and to my regret, to say to you that the last decrees issued in Ayacucho, regarding the persons and property of those citizens who decline to recognize Mr. Piérola, are inhuman and barbarous, and serve to place the government employing such measures beyond the pale of the law. (Mr. Hurlbut refers to a wholesale decree of confiscation and death issued by Piérola, but which has not yet caused any great alarm among his opponents.) These violent decrees are, according to my way of thinking, conclusive proofs that the government of which you form a part is only supported by force, and not by the weight of public opinion. A strong government, resting or based on public opinion and sovereign will, never appeals to such cruel means of devastation. Such methods oblige civilized governments to regard with reprobation the authorities employing them. I think I have said all that I think is my duty respecting the government presided over by Mr. Piérola. The administration of Mr. Garcia Calderon does not pretend to be perfectly regular in its formation. It is provisional, that is, a transitory means of exercising governmental functions until such time as the nation may act directly and without pressure. It is supported by Congress, a national Congress recognized by the constitution, and it is the embodiment of an effort toward the re-establishment in this country of a properly organized and constitutional government. You are mistaken in stating that this government of Mr. Garcia Calderon meets with Chilian sympathy. It desires peace, as does the entire country, but without sacrificing national honor, nor will it cede territory to obtain that peace. The Chilian authorities are in communication with both parties, and even you have written to Admiral Lynch. Chili desires and asks for the territory of Tarapacá, and will recognize the party ceding it. The cabinet of Garcia Calderon will not consent to this cession; it remains to be seen if Mr. Piérola will do so. Meanwhile, under the regimen inaugurated in Ayacucho and put in practice by the prefects, Peruvians are to-day more deadly enemies to themselves than are the Chilians, and the efforts of those friendly to Peru are paralyzed on account of these internal dissensions. When the United States asks Chili why she cannot make peace, the answer is that no one can be found in Peru to treat with.

Is it not better to put an end to this state of affairs, and for all true Peruvians to unite under one chief, whose authority would be acknowledged and protected by all parties and factions, in order to save the country from its imminent ruin, to establish peace, and restore the proper and pacific supremacy of the constitution and the law?

I have the honor, &c.,

S. A. HURLBUT.

No. 118.

Mr. Martinez to Mr. Blaine.

[Translation.]

The envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Chili has the honor to present his respects to his excellency the Secretary of State, and to inclose herewith, pursuant to the request his excellency was pleased to make, a copy of the confidential dispatch of the minister for foreign affairs of Chili, dated the 12th of September last.

WASHINGTON, October 27, 1881.

[Inclosure.—Translation.]

Mr. Valderrama to Mr. Martinez.

Confidential.] SANTIAGO, September 12, 1881.

By dispatches which were in due season addressed to you by Don Joaquin Godoy from Lima you will have been informed of the very uncircumspect conduct of the minister of the United States recently accredited to the provisional government of Señor Garcia Calderon.

From the time of his arrival at Lima Mr. Hurlbut has omitted no signs of decided partiality in favor of Peru, giving it to be understood that the Government of the United States would resist any arrangement which Chili might endeavor to effect with that republic, and which might involve the cession of any part of its territory.

These ideas, which obtained a footing among the public men of Peru, acquired still greater persistence after the address delivered by the American minister on the public occasion of presenting his credentials to the provisional President. From that moment Mr. Garcia Calderon, the members of his cabinet, and all persons who had any influence whatever upon the public opinion, deemed themselves encouraged by the words and demonstrations of the representative of the United States, believing that they saw therein the expression of the policy which the Cabinet at Washington proposed to adopt.

Our plenipotentiary, Mr. Godoy, carefully observed the reaction which was brought about in the Peruvian mind by the conduct of Mr. Hurlbut. To the negotiations which have been initiated in a conciliatory and accommodating spirit before the arrival of the American minister, there succeeded after his arrival a sudden and unlooked-for change, the explanation of which can only be attributed to the influence, directly or indirectly, produced by the attitude of the representative of the United States. In this state of affairs our plenipotentiary deemed it proper to suspend the negotiations already set on foot, and went to Chili to confer with my government.

Being desirous of inquiring if the conduct of Mr. Hurlbut responded to a political plan of his government, I held a conference with Mr. Kilpatrick, who expressed himself dissatisfied with the manner in which his colleague in Lima had begun his diplomatic mission. Mr. Kilpatrick did not hesitate to affirm that Mr. Hurlbut did not faithfully represent the policy of abstention and neutrality of his government. In order to relieve my government of all unfounded apprehension in this respect, he made me acquainted with the dispatch which contained his own instructions, adding that the instructions given his colleague at Lima, who was appointed at the same time, could not but be in entire conformity with his own.

In those instructions, and in the part thereof which refers to the war between Chili, Peru, and Bolivia, the Government of the United States shows itself in entire conformity with its previous policy. It exhibits the intention of not interfering in the solution of the war, except in the case of its good offices being solicited by all the belligerents. As respects the cession of a part of the Peruvian territory, the Government of the United States expresses no surprise whatever that such should appear among the conditions of peace. It observes, in passing, that it would be expedient if the territorial cession should not comprise cities whose inhabitants are exclusively Peruvians, and should not desire to choose the citizenship of our country. But this last appears rather a friendly reflection than as an exigency of American policy.

Meanwhile it is not possible to ignore the fact that the presence of Mr. Hurlbut in Lima has been in a high degree prejudicial to the conclusion of arrangements for peace. I have ground to believe that he continues to place at the service of the purposes of the provisional government all the influence which can be given by the representative character he holds.

As late as yesterday I learned, in a confidential way, but one entirely trustworthy, that he has sent a telegram to Mr. Kilpatrick, in Santiago, begging him to forward it to his colleague at Buenos Ayres. In this telegram Mr. Hurlbut seconded, doubtless, the plans of Mr. Garcia Calderon, and asks his colleague in Buenos Ayres that he should represent to the Argentine cabinet the urgent necessity of accrediting, without loss of time, a representative at Lima. There are no reasons to think that the government of Señor Garcia Calderon would welcome the presence of an Argentine minister in Peru, in order to seek therefrom mild or effective aid against us.

These considerations, to which you will give all the importance which they themselves possess, induce me to charge you to endeavor to see the Secretary of State, in order to let him see, in a confidential and delicate way, the manner in which Mr. Hurlbut is interpreting his policy in Peru. You will endeavor, also, with the greatest discretion, to obtain from the American Government some act or declaration which will tend to destroy the bad impression caused by the conduct of their representative in Lima, to avoid in future that he shall continue to create difficulties foreign to his official character, and contrary to the ever friendly and loyal policy of the United States.

May God guard you.

No. 28.] LEGATION OF CHILI IN THE UNITED STATES, Washington, October 27, 1881. (Received November 1.)

SIR: I have the pleasure to inform your excellency that the treaty for the settlement of the boundary question, concluded between Chili and the Argentine Republic, having been approved by the Congresses of both nations, has been ratified, and that the ratifications have been exchanged.

As very valuable services were lent in the conclusion of that treaty by the honorable ministers of the United States at Santiago and Buenos Ayres, my government through me, performs the pleasing duty of returning its warmest thanks to your excellency, as it has already done personally to the distinguished diplomatist Thomas H. [meaning A.] Osborn.

LEGACION DE CHILE,
Washington, October 28, 1881.

SIR: Yesterday when I read to you Admiral Lynch's letter I made you remark that this gentleman said that he was going to take possession of the offices belonging to Garcia Calderon without giving previous knowledge of this act to anybody, in order that the important papers might not be hidden. But I have just had another letter from Mr. Lynch, telling me that he thought it more prudent to let Mr. Garcia Calderon himself know about what he was going to do. He assures me that that gentleman consulted Minister Hurlbut and some of the senators and deputies, and consequently addressed to Mr. Lynch a very original and eccentric letter. This same letter has been published in the Lima papers, and now I have it in my possession. Lynch answered it immediately.

Garcia Calderon and his friends spoke about the American fleet meeting at Callao. In fact, Mr. Hurlbut called the admiral-in-chief, who thought that there had been an insurrection in Lima, occasioned by the withdrawal of the Chilian troops. He was greatly surprised at finding everything in peace. The American admiral does perfect justice to the Chilians.

Seeing General Lynch that Garcia Calderon persisted in giving himself presidential airs, although he had no offices nor territory to rule, thought that this queer conduct arose from that fiscal emission of bank-notes that I have mentioned to you; so that the Chilian chief had to issue a decree to put a stop to that affair.

I make these explanations, so that you might see that Mr. Lynch's conduct has been perfectly correct.

I am, sir, yours, obedient,

M. MARTINEZ.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 15, 1881.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 27th ultimo, announcing that the boundary treaty concluded between the Republic of Chili and the Argentine Confederation has been approved by the Congresses of those nations, and ratified by both, and that the ratifications have been exchanged. You add that, as in the conclusion of that instrument, the ministers of the United States at Santiago and Buenos Ayres, respectively, had rendered very useful services, you had been charged by your government to offer to the Government of the United States its warmest thanks for that noble co-operation, as had already been done "personally to the distinguished diplomatist Thomas A. Osborn."

In reply I have the honor to state that the information conveyed by your note has been peculiarly acceptable. It is agreeable to know that the difficult and troublesome subject of boundary between the friendly powers of Chili and the Argentine Republic has been peaceably, definitely, and satisfactorily adjusted, and that those parties have paid the representatives of the United States referred to the high compliment of trusting to the aid of their judgment and integrity in the settlement of the intricate questions involved.

Accept, sir, &c.,

No. 122.

Mr. Martinez to Mr. Blaine.

LEGATION OF CHILI,
Washington, November 26, 1881. (Received November 30.)

SIR: Yielding to the purpose of communicating to the Department of State the actual course of events that occur on the Pacific coast, I shall briefly refer to the authentic intelligences that I have had by the last mail.

Several of the military chiefs in Arequipa, availing themselves of the absence of Piérola and Colonel Solar, declared themselves in favor of the late provisional government of Garcia Calderon, giving the three following reasons for so doing:

1st. That Piérola tyranny's was absolutely intolerable. That the country could not carry on the war with Chili, and that the United States had offered their intervention, in order to obtain an agreement of peace that did not comprise territorial cession. Certainly those patriots did not explain how Peru could otherwise answer the claims of Chili.

Some time afterwards Rear Admiral Montero, who had been for some months past inactive on the Cajamarca mountains, accepted the irregular and unconstitutional offer for the vice-presidency of the republic. In his letter of acceptance, dated last October 23, he made declarations which are absolutely necessary that your excellency should hear of, to know on what illusions the Peruvian leaders found their politics, and also to know the role the American legation is made to assume in all those affairs.

The philosophy arising from the facts that I am going to state is, that, while these illusions and hopes are being kept up, peace will be impossible.

Montero says:

> The noble officiousness of the Government of the United States, manifested in the documents which have successively been published, even the definite declarations comprised in the letter written at the request of the notables of Lima by the honorable minister plenipotentiary from Washington (letter which nobody has seen) which has completely changed the situation, and consequently its proper resolution.

He adds that he has officially communicated his resolution to the representative of the United States, in a dispatch directed on the same date. He finally states that "his noble wishes of increasing the elements to defend his country are greatly gratified"! and concludes, assuring that "he redoubles his activity to multiply the necessary elements in order to be always ready for its support, till he sees the final issue of the diplomatic affairs with Chili"!

If, as it is said, Garcia Calderon has been imprisoned because he insisted upon sneering the decree of the Chilian general within the limits of the Chilian forces, it is probable that Montero will represent the provisional government, and I beg your excellency to remark that this chief assures he has forces, and that he is desirous to have more to continue their armed resistance against Chili.

The protest of all these chiefs against a territorial cession is established on the chimerical intervention of the United States, warranted by Minister Hurlbut, to whom Montero has addressed himself as his immediate superior.

Your excellency's deep penetration will judge in the same way that I do. I allow so to express myself, this queer and anomalous situation. All that is extraordinary and unexpected in the affairs of Peru will very often, I have no doubt, call your excellency's attention, and will too often explain that providence did not endow that country with any logic.

I have some reasons to believe that in some information sent from Lima to the Department of State they insist on saying that the indemnification which Chili pretends to ask exceeds the limits of justice, and that the authorities in Lima have acted very cruelly toward the Peruvians.

Both informations, if they are known to your excellency, are entirely erroneous.

As to the indemnification, I will only say that those who think exaggerated the claims of Chili, entitled as it is by the perfect right of its actual situation, are under a mistake, for they are moderate and equitable, as it will probably be demonstrated as international courtesy when the time comes to make them practicable. Those who think otherwise do it, either out of dislike or want of knowledge in the matter, being for the rest no judges to give their opinions in businesses that do not concern them.

As for the second information, the want of truth is but too plain. If any good quality is to be precisely acknowledged in the Chilians, it is that of not being sanguinary. It can be assured that in the space of eight years not more than three or four capital executions ever occur in Chili.

When the Chilian army occupied Lima the general in chief invited the Peruvian tribunals to continue in their functions, and they absolutely refused. It was necessary to establish a military tribunal, ruled under martial law, to maintain the public peace.

In a country greatly demoralized and given up to anarchy, like Peru, it was necessary to give examples of rigor, and nevertheless there have been but few condemned to death, and those for acts of unheard of cruelty.

Meanwhile the society in Lima rests quietly under the auspices of peace and order guaranteed by the Chilians.

I shall continue to communicate to your excellency my informations, and, in doing so this time, I renew my sentiments of highest consideration.

M. MARTINEZ.

No. 123.

Mr. Martinez to Mr. Blaine.

LEGATION OF CHILI,
Washington, December 5, 1881. (Received Dec. 5.)

SIR: I intend to go on with the agreeable task of letting you know which are the last authentic news from the Pacific coast, as they are generally made public in a way calculated to mislead.

Your excellency has already been made acquainted with the decree issued by the Chilian general, Patricio Lynch, prohibiting Dr. Garcia Calderon from exercising any act of jurisdiction within the territory occupied by the Chilian forces, but by no means out of that territory.

Indeed there was a political and military misdeed in the fact of the commander of an invading army allowing the so-called provisional President, whose incapacity and unwillingness to make the peace were well known, to continue as a government in face of his foe. You will please to allow me to state again to your excellency that Chili never recognized Garcia Calderon as the provisional President, and that had she made such a recognition it would have been outlawed when that gentleman made up his mind to reject the terms of peace my government proposed to him.

In spite of the above-named decree, Garcia Calderon went on assuming to himself the functions of President of the government, but being his attitude apparently obnoxious, the Chilian general did not deem it proper to take any measure against him, and I warn your excellency that the ground for the General Lynch to act as I have just stated was the recognition of Garcia Calderon as provisional President made by the United States purposely to lead way to an arrangement of peace.

But it happened Mr. Galvez to address in those days a circular to the diplomatic and consular corps in paper bearing the official seal, dated in Lima, and issued in such a condition as every public document is intended to have, and stating that it was expected to make peace with no dissatisfaction for the national dignity; that is to say, with no teritorial compensation. Mr. Galvez was Mr. Garcia Calderon's secretary of state.

Being this an open and daring violation of the Chilian commander's decree, he was compelled to take such a measure as to put in prison the so-called provisional President and his secretary of state.

The measure was executed most quietly. Mr. Garcia Calderon intimates he wanted to hold a private interview with General Lynch, so he walked along about fourteen blocks and not the slightest sign of resistance was noticeable in the crowd.

The prisoners were taken, surrounded with the best treatment, to the iron-clad Almiranti Cockrane, and in Pisco they were transferred to the frigate Chili.

Meanwhile the Peruvian general, Montero, being out of the reach of the Chilian forces, has accepted the vice-presidency of the republic, and notwithstanding being the offering of the vice-presidency and its acceptation irregular acts, the Chilians, keeping faith to their resolution of not interfering with the internal politics in Peru, had opposed no resistance whatever to Montero.

A Peruvian committee started from Lima to meet Montero, and contrive he should go so far as Chimbote, so that he may try to capitulate some terms of peace which my government might agree to.

This incident shows the possibility of the conflict to be arranged as far as the Peruvians will not content themselves with the deceitful expectations of a foreign interference.

The ex-dictator, Piérola, remains in Ayacucho with an army 1,700 strong. His general secretary, Garcia ì Garcia, issued under the date of the 23d October a circular addressed to the chiefs and governors in the republic, bitterly criticising Mr. Hurlbut's letter, which your excellency has already been acquainted with.

The Chieftain Caceres is, with an army stronger than that of Piérola, not very far from Lima, and keeps a reserved attitude; he does not declare himself in anybody's favor, but apparently he is obeying his former chief, Piérola.

Such is without any comment the condition of affairs in Peru.

It would be not unsuitable for your excellency to become acquainted with a somewhat painful incident. Garcia Calderon intended to send to Arequipa one of his brothers, as a commissioner, and asked permission for him to be allowed to land at Mollendo, which is now a blockaded port. He was not permitted to do it. Then the said commissioner got by stealth a passport from the Chilian colonel, Valdivieso, telling him he purposed to go from Lima to a near place. Having the passport been given by Valdivieso, Garcia Calderon's brother wrote down on it that it was good to go to Mollendo. This was not enough for his purposes, being it necessary to get permission from the general headquarters to reach a blockaded port, he did not ask for it; but the United States man-of-war Alaska was about to sail off to Mollendo, and everybody asserts on her board went the commissioner of Garcia Calderon, taking with him correspondence and money to the rebels in Arequipa. Though I cannot state the fact officially, it appears to me to bear the characteristics of the truth.

As for Bolivia is concerned, all that is now known is that General Campero has driven as far as four or five days' march from Tarapacá, having under his command an army about 4,500 strong.

The Chilian authorities are now under notice not to allow themselves to be surprised.

It is to be derived from the precedents informations that the enemies of Chili are again armed and unwilling to make peace, repeatedly proposed to long ago. They consider a term as indecorous, notwithstanding it has been agreed with by many nations superior to them, and Chili is not to be responsible for such a denying, nor she can be ascribed to the delaying of a status quo, the lasting of which is not her fault.

Accept, sir, &c.,

M. MARTINEZ.

No. 4.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, September 27, 1880.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

We reached here upon the 19th instant, and found waiting our arrival a communication from the foreign office, informing us of the appointment of two commissioners by the Chinese Government, with full powers. Copies of this communication and our reply are inclosed.

The two commissioners are men of high rank and large influence, and are both members of the privy council of State; they are also ministers in the foreign office. They are both advanced in years. His excellency Pao Chün is a Manchu, distantly related to the imperial family. In addition to the offices mentioned above, he is president of the Imperial College of Literature and superintendent of the board of rites. He has had long experience in foreign matters, and is understood to be conciliatory and progressive in his policy. His excellency Li Hung Tsao, is a Chinese. He was the tutor of the late Emperor Tung Chih, and has the reputation of being one of the most profound scholars in the empire. He has been a member of the foreign office for about five years, and is credited with being anti-foreign or reactionary in his views.

We have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.
JOHN F. SWIFT.
WM. HENRY TRESCOT.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 4.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of State for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication:

Upon the 23d ultimo, I had the honor to receive a dispatch from your excellency, stating that the President of the United States had appointed your excellency, the Hon. John F. Swift, and the Hon. William H. Trescot, commissioners plenipotentiary to China, and empowered them to confer with commissioners appointed with full powers by the Emperor of China, and has also empowered them to negotiate and sign treaties or conventions to the end of effecting a settlement of questions of interest now pending between the two governments. Your excellency also requested me to memorialize the throne with a view to the appointment of commissioners upon the part of China.

I at once addressed the throne upon this subject, and upon the 5th instant His Imperial Majesty issued his mandate in the following terms:

"Let Pao Chün and Li Hung Tsao, be appointed commissioners plenipotentiary for conference upon matters of the treaty and subjects of interest. Respect this."

It becomes my duty to forward a copy of this decree, as above, for your consideration.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1880.

YOUR IMPERIAL HIGHNESS: Upon our arrival at this capital we had the honor to receive your imperial highness's communication addressed to Mr. Angell, and in response to his letter of August 23, by which we are informed that His Imperial Majesty has been pleased to appoint their excellencies Pao Chün and Li Hung Tsao commissioners plenipotentiary on the part of China to treat with us upon certain matters of interest now pending between the two governments.

The United States will not fail to appreciate the promptness and good disposition thus shown by the government of His Imperial Majesty, and in acknowledging receipt of your imperial highness's communication, we beg leave to add the expression of our sincere desire, that through our deliberations results may be reached at an early moment which will prove beneficial alike to China and the United States.

No. 25.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, October 6, 1880.

SIR: I herewith inclose a circular letter, which I am issuing to our consuls in China.

The general pilotage regulations, though drafted by Sir Rutherford Alcock, were submitted to the foreign ministers at Peking and approved by them prior to their promulgation in November, 1868. Sir Thomas Wade therefore recognizes the propriety of submitting to foreign ministers the slight changes suggested by the chief justice of Her Britanic Majesty's supreme court at Shanghai.

It has seemed to me not improbable that during the twelve years of trial of the regulations some graver defects than those indicated by the chief justice may have become apparent, and that this may be a favorable opportunity to secure any needed improvement.

I inclose subsections 3 and 4 of the regulations.

The judge finds subsection 3, if I understand him, useless, because the laws of Great Britain prescribe no penalty for the offense named, and subsection 4 in conflict with the order in council, which prescribes that only a part of the maximum fine named can be imposed.

I have the honor, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

CIRCULAR.

PEKING, October 6, 1880.

SIR: In a case carried up by appeal from the British consular court at Swatow to the supreme court at Shanghai, the chief justice has rendered an opinion (see North China Daily News of August 10) in which he finds subsection 3 of the seventh of the general pilotage regulations, adopted in 1868, in conflict with British statutes, and subsection 4 in conflict with British orders in council.

He has suggested to the British minister that a revision of these subsections be made, and Sir Thomas Wade has submitted the matter to the foreign ministers here for considerations.

It has occurred to me that possibly the experience of twelve years has shown that some considerable modifications, perhaps a general revision, of the regulations may have become desirable. I therefore desire you to inform me—

First. Whether, in your opinion, subsections 3 and 4 of the general pilotage regulations need alteration.

Secondly. Whether there should be more important modifications of the regulations, or even a complete revision of them.

I am, sir, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

General Pilotage Regulations.

REGULATION VII.

SUBSECTION 3. Any one piloting without a license, or making use of another's license, shall be subject to prosecution before his own authorities who will deal with the offender in accordance with the laws of his country. Any pilot lending his license to another will be proceeded against and dealt with in the same way in addition to forfeiting his license.

SUBSECTION 4. Any commanding officer employing an unlicensed person to pilot his vessel will be liable to be fined in the sum of 100 taels by the authorities to whose jurisdiction he is amenable.

No. 6.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, October 11, 1880.

SIR: Recurring to our dispatch No. 4, of the 27th ultimo, in which we reported our arrival here, and the appointment by the Government of China of two commissioners plenipotentiary, we have now the honor to inform you that upon the 1st instant we met the two commissioners at the foreign office by appointment and exchanged our full powers. Those presented for our inspection by their excellencies Pao and Li were in the usual Chinese form, and consisted of the imperial decree appointing them, a translation of which is quoted in the dispatch of Prince Kung, which forms inclosure No. 1 of our dispatch referred to above. There were present on this occasion three prominent ministers of the foreign office in addition to the two commissioners.

Having thus exchanged our full powers, we laid before the commissioners a memorandum, a copy of which is inclosed, in which we stated in general terms the purpose of the government in our appointment, the difficulties which confronted it in consequence of the excessive immigration of Chinese, and its desire to secure such modification of existing treaties as should leave it free to deal with the questions growing out of the immigration of Chinese, as public interests might demand.

The commissioners and other ministers present, having read this paper, remarked upon the friendliness of its tone, and stated that they were desirous of reaching a solution of the questions involved at an early moment. They added that they would consult with Prince Kung and send us a memorandum in response at an early day. The interview then ended.

Upon the 7th instant we received the response as promised, a copy of which is herewith inclosed. We at once sought a further interview with the commissioners, and had purposed meeting them to-day, but, at their request, the interview has been deferred to the 13th instant.

We do not think it necessary at the moment to trouble you with the obvious reply to be made to this very inconsequential document. It will be forwarded at an early day. The Department may be assured that we shall not recognize the right of the Chinese Government to go behind the language of the representatives of the Government of the United States and assign motives and reasons for its diplomatic action other than those defined by itself.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

JAMES B. ANGELL.
JOHN F. SWIFT.

MEMORANDUM.

After the exchange of full powers which has just taken place, it becomes the duty of the commissioners of the United States to lay before the commissioners of China with entire frankness the purpose of their mission.

Fortunately the relations of the two countries have been of unbroken and increasing friendship from the date of the first treaty negotiated between them to the present moment. It is only natural that it should have been so. Without conflicting interest to disturb their relations, representing in their territorial extent and in their large populations, the power of the two great nations which occupy the shores of the Pacific Ocean, they are united by the consciousness that free intercourse between them properly conducted can only be beneficial to both.

We have now had the experience of many years as to the effect of that intercourse, and our object is, in full and friendly consultation with the representatives of the Chinese Government, to ascertain what modifications in its regulation may have become necessary, as the effect upon those interests has now come to be known to both governments by the practical operation of existing treaties.

Under the treaties which have from time to time been negotiated between the two countries, the merchants of the United States have resorted to the treaty ports of China in the pursuit of their calling, while those of China have come to the United States, where they have been made welcome to engage in trade in all parts of the country, and have been uniformly protected in their rights, and their merchants have exchanged the products of the two countries, as we believe, to the mutual advantage of both.

There has also been a constant and useful international communication, taking its rise in motives of philanthropy, or a respectful curiosity as to the habits, manners, and institutions of each other, which the students of all nations have been at all times permitted and encouraged to cultivate.

But we wish to ask the attention of the Chinese Government to a species of intercourse which has increased to a large extent within the last few years, and which has subjected the Government of the United States to very grave embarrassments.

A class of Chinese subjects immigrating to the United States without the purpose of changing their allegiance and intending only a temporary residence, claims all the privileges and exemptions provided by express treaty stipulations for "permanent residence." This same class, consisting entirely of laborers, coming in great numbers, with the avowed intention of early return, and concerted arrangements for a new supply, with the almost absolute exclusion of all family and domestic relations in their association, and jealously preserving their peculiar nationality in dress, language, creed, and habits, claims that it is entitled to all the privileges of the subjects and citizens of the most favored nation; although the immigration from no other nation at all resembles this in its purpose, its methods, or its consequences. All other immigrants come to the United States with the express purpose of changing their allegiance, with their wives and children, to be in the course of a generation completely incorporated into the country of their adoption.

Of late years this immigration has concentrated itself in cities and come into direct competition with native laborers, making their struggle for livelihood a hard one and disabling them, by their exclusion from accustomed work, to discharge those social and political duties which the Government of the United States expects from every one of its citizens. This competition engenders popular discontent and raises questions which, if left unsettled, may disturb the friendly relations of the two countries.

The commissioners of China will, we are sure, understand how grave a problem it would be, for the solution of their own government, if one hundred thousand foreign laborers were in a body introduced into the capital, or into any great city of the empire, to bring their new and strange manners and habits and to take the places of the same number of native Chinese, whose ability to discharge their duties as subjects by contributing their taxes and fulfilling their other liabilities, was in great measure dependent upon their capacity to maintain themselves and their families by their daily work.

In addition to this, it must be remembered that from the enormous population of China, such a number of immigrants could be gathered under the stimulant of gain to those who sent them as would exceed the native population of more than one of the United States, unless the Governments of China and the United States recognize their common right to deal with this subject by such legislation as the best interests of both countries require.

The commissioners of the United States would also call to the attention of the Chinese Government, that for this extension of these privileges to all Chinese subjects throughout the whole territorial integrity of the United States, the citizen of the United States is only entitled to the limited hospitality of a few open ports, and in them only for the purpose of trade, travel, or residence.

But the Government of the United States does not wish to conduct this discussion in any controversial spirit. It has no desire or intention to do injustice to the character of the Chinese laborer. But it does feel justified in asking that it shall be allowed to judge for itself to what extent the immigration of Chinese labor is useful and advantageous, and that whenever at particular times or particular places it feels that its social or industrial interests require a limitation or prohibition of such immigration, it shall have the authority with due communication to the representatives of the Chinese Government to regulate it as is most consonant with those interests.

So far as those are concerned who, under treaty guarantee, have come to the United States, the government recognizes but one duty, and that is to maintain them in the exercise of their treaty privileges against any opposition, whether it takes the shape of popular violence or of legislative enactment. And that the Government of the United States has fully discharged this duty is apparent from the fact which we may assume is within the knowledge of the Chinese Government, that the courts of the United States have, on every occasion where the issue has been raised, sustained the privilege of the treaty against the limitation of the State law. The disturbances which have sometimes occurred from occasional excitement of popular feeling are too small and too rare to furnish subject of discussion now.

The Government of the United States feels that in bringing this subject to your attention, it is deferring to the opinion of the Chinese Government, which, if we are rightly informed, has never encouraged the immigration of its people, which does not wish that immigration from China should be assimilated to immigration from other countries, and which prefers that such immigration should be under its own control.

The commissioners of the United States feel that they are warranted in thus interpreting the wishes of the Chinese Government, from the fact that in a recent treaty with Spain the Chinese Government granted to the local authorities of the Island of Cuba the right to exercise a discretion of the same character which the Government of the United States desires should be recognized as its right.

As the most earnest desire and purpose of the Government of the United States are not only to adhere with scrupulous fidelity to their treaty obligations, but to construe all such obligations in that spirit of friendly liberality which has marked its relations with the Chinese Government, we have been instructed to meet you in amicable consultation to review such treaty provisions as bear upon the subject, and to seek with you a solution of the difficulties which will be alike honorable and satisfactory to both countries. Any suggestion of the Chinese Government as to the form in which such modification of existing treaties can be made most agreeable to it will receive from us the most respectful and attentive consideration.

Their excellencies Pao and Li to the commissioners.

Upon the 1st instant your excellencies left with us at the foreign office a memorandum upon certain treaty modifications. We have carefully considered it, and beg to submit a note in response. We shall be glad to hear how it strikes your excellencies.

PEKING, October 7, 1880.

A few days since the full powers of the commissioners plenipotentiary on either side were mutually inspected. We presume your excellencies have had a translation of our full powers made and have sufficiently examined them. We have submitted yours to the Prince, and now beg to return them herewith. Will you be so good as to receive them and to return ours to this office at your convenience?

Upon the 1st instant your excellencies came to the foreign office and personally handed to us a minute upon certain treaty modifications. We have given this paper our careful consideration. The objective point of its several sections is a discussion in a friendly spirit which shall result in mutual benefit, and shall be free from harm to either party.

China and the United States have been on friendly terms from the first. But from the ratification of the Burlingame treaty a decided strengthening in our relations of amity has been seen.

The people of either country have passed to and from the other, and have never failed to receive all thebenefits, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to them by the treaties. To refer, for example, to the Chinese laborers in California: Their number certainly is not small. Being from a race of dwellers upon the sea-coast, they have desired to go thither, and have regarded California as a land of abundance and as furnishing great opportunites. They have also rejoiced in the freedom of the United States. Hence they have not gone there as the result of deceit, or by being kidnapped, nor under contract as coolies, but have flown thither as the wild geese fly.

In the many years of Chinese emigration to California a hundred lines of enterprise have arisen, and commercial activity has developed to an immense extent. The Chinese have given a large amount of their labor to your people, and the benefits of that labor to your country have certainly not been few. But now, because the Chinese do good work for small remuneration, the rabble are making complaints. Since the amount paid to the laborer is small, the employer is able to save more, and hence the benefit still inures to the citizen of the United States. This would seem to be fair reasoning the world over.

Last year the Congress of the United States passed an act restricting the immigration of Chinese, which the President of the United States vetoed. This year there has also been discriminative legislation against them, which the courts have declared unconstitutional, and hence invalid. Some time since Mr. Seward handed to us the report of Senator Morton upon Chinese immigration, in which he held that it would certainly be wrong to restrict the coming of the Chinese. He quoted the Constitution of the United States adopted at the establishment of the government, which declares: "Our territory is broad and our people few in number. People of all nations shall be permitted to come to our land without let or hinderance." He also quoted the Burlingame treaty, which declares that the people of either country shall be permitted to go freely to the other, either with the purpose of residing permanently there, and of becoming citizens or subjects, or temporarily; that they shall go voluntarily and shall not be hindered.

These statements, both official and personal, are all to the point. If now because of temporary competition between the Irish and stranger guests a decision is lightly taken to change the policy of the government, contradiction with the Constitution of the United States and existing treaties cannot be avoided.

Since the establishment of treaty relations between the two countries, citizens of the United States in China have not been relegated to the jurisdiction of the Chinese authorities. China has accorded this privilege to the United States. Chinese subjects have been permitted to go and come at their pleasure. The United States has granted this concession to China. At the ratification of this treaty the people of both sides of the Pacific Ocean leaped, shouted, and clapped their hands with joy and pleasure, friendly relations were firmly established, divisions were obliterated, the people could come and go as they chose, and the governments only heeded the wishes of the people. All this was eminently just and honorable in the highest degree to the United States. This being so, when other powers were exceedingly urgent in their need of Chinese labor, and desired this government to allow its subjects to go of their own free will, this government, because those other powers treated the Chinese laborer harshly and not with the kindness shown them by the United States, could not do otherwise than take this difference into consideration.

Hence the facts which resulted in the stipulation referred to in the Cuban convention are unlike the circumstances in the United States, and your government should not look upon that stipulation as a satisfactory rule of action. In a word, there are Chinese who go to the United States as merchants and traders, and there are also Chinese who go there as laborers. Formerly, when there was a demand for these laborers, the only fear was that they would not go thither; and now, because of the influence of violent men, there exists a desire that they stay away.

In consideration of the permanent friendship between the two countries, it is believed that the United States by no means entertains this idea. But as the number of Chinese laborers in California is daily increasing there cannot but be abuses. This is manifestly true. Hence, last year the foreign office consented to enter upon negotiations with Mr. Seward to prohibit the four classes of cooly laborers, criminals, prostitutes, and diseased persons from going thither.

Since now your excellencies desire to discuss this business further with us, we are ready to discuss further the proposition of Mr. Seward, with the hope that an equitable solution may be reached, and that the purpose of avoiding difficulties and securing beneficial results may not be lost sight of on either side, provided always that such negotiations shall not be contrary to the stipulations of the Burlingame treaty.

We are by no means unalterably fixed in our views.

No. 8.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, October 23, 1880.

SIR: Our dispatch No. 6 covered the memorandum which we submitted at our first interview with the Chinese commissioners, and the reply which they transmitted a few days after.

Upon the receipt of that reply we asked for and obtained an interview on the 13th instant, at which we took up their paper, paragraph by paragraph, and discussed its points in conversation. A précis of that conversation, which was submitted to the Chinese commissioners, accompanies this dispatch.

At the same time we placed before them a draft of such modification of existing treaties as we thought necessary to secure the object of our mission, a copy of which will be found in inclosure No. 2.

Yesterday, the 22d, we received a communication, a copy of which will be found in inclosure No. 3, and immediately upon its receipt asked for a conference to-day. It was long and full, but owing to the hour at which it was held, and the character of the discussion, it is impossible to prepare a précis in time for the mail which leaves to-morrow.

We need only say at present that it was on the whole quite satisfactory; that the Chinese commissioners disclaimed any intention of laying down an ultimatum of concession in the language which they had used, declared their object to be rather to reach a full understanding of what we wished, expressed their satisfaction with such explanations as we furnished, and assured us that they had but one purpose, and that was to come to an amicable solution of the matters under discussion, and to do so in time to allow the commissioners to leave before the close of navigation.

A précis of the conversation will be sent by the next mail.

We have the honor to be, &c.,

[Inclosure 1 in No. 8.]

Précis of a conversation had with the Chinese Commissioners, Wednesday, October 13, 1880.

Mr. TRESCOT, on behalf of the United States commissioners, said: We have received the communication of your excellencies, with the request that we would say how it strikes us.

We will do so with entire frankness, but you must first allow us to correct some misconceptions, which we think your excellencies will not be unwilling to have removed.

You say, referring to immigration into the United States of Chinese laborers: "Formerly, when there was a demand for these laborers, the only fear was that they would not go thither, and now because of the influence of violent men there exists a desire that they stay away."

Again: "But now, because the Chinese do good work for small remuneration, the rabble are making a complaint." Again: "If now, because of temporary competition between the Irish and stranger guests a decision is lightly taken to change the policy of the government, contradiction with the Constitution of the United States and existing treaties cannot be avoided."

Knowing as we do the well established and traditional courtesy of the Chinese Government in its relations with other nations, we are sure that you did not mean to give offense by this language. But we feel it our duty both to ourselves and to our government to recall to your attention that we represent the Government of the United States, and that any communication we make comes from it, after careful and most friendly consideration, and is entitled at your hands to the same respect with which any communication from you has been, and will always be, received by us. You can scarcely mean to say that the Government of the United States is merely speaking the language of "violent men," or that the great nation in whose name it addresses you is "rabble," or that "a competition between the Irish and stranger guests" is the motive of its conduct.

You will certainly recognize that the Government of the United States, like the Government of China, has the right to appreciate for itself the motives of its own policy, and that when it addresses to the Chinese Government a communication upon a subject of grave interest in respectful and friendly language, it cannot allow the representatives of China to go behind that communication, and either criticise its motives or deny the good faith of its representations.

Your excellencies would be justly offended if we should venture to consider your language as anything less than the authorized voice of your government, and if we presumed to go beyond your words and to look for your motives and reasons in the rumors of the streets and the public gossip of the people.

We trust, therefore, that your excellencies will understand that we are speaking for the Government of the United States, and that we represent in all that we may say the grave, well considered resolution of that government, and that while we approach you in the most amicable spirit, and will give the most respectful attention to any views you may submit to our consideration, we cannot in any discussion accept as satisfactory, language which separates the Government of the United States from its people or claims the right on the part of the Chinese Government to question the sincerity of any communication which we may make in its behalf.

The Chinese COMMISSIONERS replied: What you have said is very satisfactory. Our remarks in the memorandum were by the way of argument merely, and not intended to express any positive opinion of our own. We had heard that the Chinese in California were not in accord with the Irish, and came into competition with them. A minister told us that this fact was at the bottom of the difficulty, and so we mentioned it in our memorandum. But we added also in the memorandum that we did not believe the government was influenced by such motives. Our only desire is to discuss and settle these questions upon a basis of mutual amity.

Mr. TRESCOT replied: But as an impression may have been made upon you by designing men, for mischievous purposes, that the Government of the United States does not represent the wishes of the American people, we would call to the attention of your excellencies that the people of the United States are at the present moment preparing for the periodical election of their President. As you are well aware, it is the habit on such occasions for both of the great parties of the country to declare what policy they think the interest of the country requires, and we have the honor to submit for your consideration the declarations of their opinions on the subject of Chinese immigration which they have respectively put before the world.

The Chinese COMMISSIONERS replied: No one has influenced us in this matter. We had not been biased by what we have heard.

Mr. TRESCOT continued: Your excellencies are also pleased to say to us, "Since your excellencies desire to discuss this business further with us, we are ready to discuss further the propositions of Mr. Seward." If it is the desire of your excellencies to discuss these propositions we will do so at the proper time, but we feel it best to inform your excellencies that these propositions in no wise represent the wish or purpose of the United States Government, and that the appointment of a new minister and our presence here with full powers to negotiate ought to be to you sufficient evidence of what value you should attach to such representations. We are entirely unaware of any authority or approval given by the Government of the United States to the proposal submitted on his own responsibility by Mr. Seward to the Chinese Government.

The Chinese COMMISSIONERS replied: We assumed, of course, that since your government had appointed a new minister and three commissioners to modify the treaty, the propositions of Minister Seward were not deemed satisfactory by your government, but we had received no official information upon this point.

Mr. TRESCOT said: Having corrected these misapprehensions, as we consider them, we cordially recognize the amicable spirit of your communication. We are glad that you acknowledge, as we have done, the long and unbroken friendship between the two countries, the fact that our intercourse has developed commercial activity to a large extent and to mutual benefit, and that immigrants from China "have never failed to receive all the benefits, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to them by the treaties," and that "all this," as you kindly and justly say, "was eminently just and honorable in the highest degree to the United States Government."

The Chinese COMMISSIONERS replied: This is simple truth. The relations existing between the two countries have been of the firmest.

Mr. TRESCOT responded: On our part we readily acknowledge the service which Chinese labor has rendered to the citizens of the United States. But we would call to your attention that this immigration had commenced and largely increased before the Burlingame treaty, and that, in our opinion, that treaty has not, as you suppose, materially contributed to the strengthening of our relations of amity. Indeed, we fear it has been the reverse; for it is only since that treaty that the question has arisen which now causes disturbance in our old and friendly relations.

And this brings us to the point of practical difference which your communication indicates as existing between us.

The Burlingame treaty gives to the subjects of China the right of unrestricted immigration into the United States; at least the Government of the United States has hitherto acquiesced in that construction of the treaty, and would much prefer to readjust its provisions than enter into any discussion of what they strictly mean.

Under the provision of that treaty, so construed, the immigration of labor from China has become very large, and has raised questions of social order and political consequences not anticipated. That this is a grave embarrassment you must receive as the conscientious conviction of the United States Government. What we are instructed to say to you is that the Government of the United States thinks it is entitled to treat this question as its own most important interest demands; that from our past relations and the advantages we have derived, you may feel assured that such immigation would not be limited or prohibited unless it threatened serious evils, and that, if it does, then we expect from the Chinese Government a due consideration of the difficulties it imposes.

The Government of the United States thinks that it ought to have the right to decide to what extent and under what circumstances that immigration is wholesome, and to stop it when it becomes injurious. Its most solemn duty to its own citizens will not allow it to forego the exercise of that right. It therefore asks you to consent to such a modification of what you consider your treaty rights under the Burlingame treaty as will enable it to discharge that duty without raising questions which might disturb the friendly relations of the two countries. If we understand your concluding remarks correctly, they seem to us to mean that you can enter upon no negotiation which looks to the modification of that treaty. If so, we do not see what we are to negotiate about. What we wish, you refuse in advance, namely, the modification of the Burlingame treaty. If you can see any way in which we can reach what we wish without a modification of that treaty, we will gladly consider it. But it does not suggest itself to us.

The Chinese COMMISSIONERS replied: That is not our idea. We are only anxious not to do anything which should be in direct opposition to the Burlingame treaty. The propositions of Mr. Seward amounted to a modification of the Burlingame treaty; for under that treaty all Chinese, good or bad, could at their own will go to the United States, and the officers of neither country could interfere. But as they went in excessive numbers, Mr. Seward proposed to take steps to prevent four classes from going thither, and China was glad to be able to concert measures with him to this end. As it appears now that your government does not approve of Mr. Seward's propositions, we are quite ready to concert further measures with you. As Prince Kung said, The United States has its difficulties in this matter, and so has China. To devise a remedy devoid of difficulty to either power will be exceedingly desirable, and I think quite feasible.

Mr. TRESCOT added: We therefore feel bound to avoid a useless waste of time and words to ask if that is the construction which we are expected to place upon your words.

We can scarcely anticipate that, because, as you say, "other powers treated the Chinese laborers harshly and not with the kindness shown them by the United States," the Chinese Government will refuse to that government as large a discretion in dealing with this question as it has conceded by treaty to those other powers. And in order to indicate with more precision what the Government of the United States desires, we submit to your consideration the following paper. (See inclosure No. 2.)

The Chinese COMMISSIONERS replied: We will carefully consider this proposition, submit it to the Prince, and give you an answer.

The commissioners were asked to give a response at an early day.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 8.]

The United States Commissioners to the Chinese commissioners.

To indicate more precisely the wishes of the United States, we suggest the following proposition for the consideration of the Chinese Government:

ARTICLE I. The United States of America and the Emperor of China recognize the mutual benefit which results from the proper intercourse of the citizens and subjects of all nations, and, in order to encourage such intercourse between the two countries, agree that citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China, and subjects of China visiting or residing in the United States, for the purpose of trade, travel, or temporary residence, for the prosecution of teaching, study, or curiosity, shall enjoy in the respective countries all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are granted by either country to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nations.

ART. II. Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects, or threatens to affect, the interest of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country, or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, suspend, or prohibit such coming or residence, after giving timely notice of such regulation, limitation, suspension, or prohibition to the Government of China, and the words Chinese laborers are herein used to signify all immigration other than that for teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity hereinbefore referred to, and authorized and provided for in existing treaties.

ART. III. But it is distinctly understood between the contracting parties that all Chinese subjects who, under the faith of existing treaties, have gone into or are now residing in the United States, shall be guaranteed all the protection, rights, immunities, and exemptions to which they are now entitled under the provision of said treaties.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 8.]

The Chinese Commissioners to Messrs. Angell, Swift, and Trescot.

Upon the 13th instant your excellencies furnished us with a project for a modification of existing treaties, and upon the 17th your excellencies forwarded a précis of our conversation of the 13th.

We have carefully studied these papers and beg now to submit for your consideration a memorandum in reply.

Cards and compliments.

PEKING, October 22, 1880.

MEMORANDUM.

Some days since, your excellencies handed to us a project, in two sections, for the modification of existing treaties, which has received our careful consideration.

Section 1 declares that the people of either country visiting or residing in the other, for the purpose of trade, travel, residence, teaching, study, or curiosity, shall enjoy in the respective countries all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are granted by either country to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation. This is in exact accord with the treaties now in force, and there seems to be no occasion for a re-enactment of this section.

Section 2 declares that there are difficulties growing out of the emigration of Chinese laborers to the United States, and explains that the words "Chinese laborers" are used to include all persons except such as go thither for the purpose of teaching, study, trade, travel, and curiosity. The separation of this class from the mass of the subjects of China in this manner is not in strict accord with the spirit of our treaties, and in practical operation would meet with many difficulties. But bearing in mind the deep friendship between the two governments, in the event of embarrassments on either part, a solution must be sought in a spirit of mutual concession.

We infer that of the phrases "regulate, limit, suspend, or prohibit," the first is a general expression referring to the others. When Mr. Holcombe was at Yamen the other day, we said to him that the use of the term prohibit was not in accordance with the treaties in force, and that China would assuredly find it difficult to adopt it.

At the moment, we are only prepared to negotiate for a mode of limitation, having in mind the interests of both governments. We are entirely ready to negotiate most carefully with your excellencies to the end that a limitation, either in point of time or of numbers, may be fixed upon the emigration of Chinese laborers to the United States. But the limitation when agreed upon can only apply to the ports of China. If persons go from other parts, China would neither know of nor be able to prevent it.

If your excellencies have any suggestions as to how this is to be accomplished, we trust you will give your views fully, so that we may consider them together. But if, after the limitation shall have been agreed upon and settled, the emigration to the United States becomes small, then the action should be as heretofore; that is, in accordance with the stipulations of existing treaties.

We appreciate beyond expression the declaration made by your excellencies, that all Chinese subjects who, under the faith of existing treaties, have gone into or are now residing in the United States shall be guaranteed all the protection, rights, immunities, and exemptions to which they are now entitled under the provisions of existing treaties.

While considering this business, your précis of our conversation came to hand and has been carefully noted.

[Extract.]

No. 42.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 2, 1880.

SIR: My predecessors have had frequent occasion to inform the Department of the embarrassments which our commerce in common with that of other nations has for years been suffering from the existence of the Woosung bar, at the mouth of the Shanghai River. They have also advised the Department of the earnest efforts which have been made by the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce, the foreign consuls at Shanghai, and the diplomatic representatives at Peking, to induce the Chinese authorities to dredge the bar, or at any rate to permit the foreign powers to do so, with the proceeds of a light levy on the commerce of Shanghai.

Some months ago in one of the diplomatic conferences held here, Sir Thomas Wade was instructed by the diplomatic corps in their behalf to present to the foreign office an urgent request to permit them to order the improvement of navigation at the bar and pay for the work by collecting light dues from the vessels which sail to and from Shanghai. In no way was the Chinese Government to be burdened, though Chinese vessels were like others to pay the dues required.

To this request the foreign board have replied in a paper which I inclose. * * *

The diplomatic conferences which were found last spring to be so serviceable, were resumed on the 25th ultimo. Among the subjects considered was that of the Woosung bar. This paper of the Tsung li Yamen was thought by all to be so feeble as to call for no formal reply. Sir Thomas Wade was instructed to renew and urge his request.

It is well understood that the real reasons why the Chinese authorities object to the dredging of the bar, are two-fold:

First. They dislike any innovation. An immense power of inertia has to be overcome to gain their assent to any change.

Secondly. They regard the bar as a natural defense of Shanghai against the war-vessels of heavy draught and especially against the ironclads. They speak of it as a "heaven-sent barrier." A noteworthy article in one of the Chinese newspapers of Shanghai lately spoke of the proposition to remove the bar as a profane suggestion to interfere with the will of Heaven.

Of the heavy burdens which the existence of the bar lays upon vessels of deep draught, there is overwhelming proof. Some very valuable and interesting figures are given in a recent dispatch from Consul-General Denny, which I inclose. There would, of course, be no need of arguing with any western nation to induce it to permit the improvement of the access to its principal port. But it is by no means certain that the present attempt of the diplomatic body will meet with early success. Even when permission has been received, time and money will be needed to make a complete examination of the river and the bar. For it is by no means certain exactly what the best remedy for the trouble is. The best engineering talent of the west should be employed to make a careful study of the problem. It seems to me highly probable that some considerable annual expenditure will always be necessary.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

THE WOOSUNG BAR.

Memorandum from the minister of the Tsung li Yamen forwarded to Sir Thomas Wade in a semi-official note dated October 5, 1880.

The memorandum on the dredging of the river at Woosung forwarded some time since in a note from the British minister was at once communicated to the minister superintendent of southern trade for consideration.

A reply has now been received from his excellency stating that this question was the subject of numerous discussions and proposals some years ago, none of which it was possible to give effect to; a further suggestion having now been made for the levy of an additional tax to meet the cost of the labor (requisite for dredging the bar), the minister has made it the subject of thorough investigation in order to ascertain whether there are or are not objections to the plan, and has also questioned the taotai at Shanghai on this matter. This officer has replied at length, pointing out that there are a multitude of difficulties which render it impossible to attempt to acquiesce in the arrangement proposed, and submits the following reason for the conclusion he has come to.

The silt and sand of the Poo* River at Woosung is the deposit of many hundred years. Large vessels belonging to foreign merchants that are heavily freighted have always been free to lighten, the privilege of lightening being accorded by treaty with the express object of meeting the case of shoal water (at the bar). But the text of the treaty mentions lightening only, and contains no reference whatever to dredging with a view to avoid lightening. Large foreign vessels can all avoid getting aground by loading less heavily, or they can wait for a tide to proceed on their way, or, if they do not follow either of these courses, it is open to them, if they please, to lighten as permitted by the regulations.

An abrupt decision to set to work to dredge [the bar] in the interest only of those foreign merchants who own large vessels, with the object of carrying large cargoes, and wish to save the expense of lightening, is not only a condition of things never contemplated by the treaty, but also does not seem to be consistent with reason. The taotai has never heard of the silt that has accumulated at Woosung having blocked up the channel during the hundreds of years it has existed.

The bar [serves a double object]. Without, it keeps back the muddy water brought up by the tide; within, it keeps back the water of the Poo River, upon which all the arable land on either shore is dependent for purposes of irrigation. Directly the bar is cleared, the silt brought in by the tide will be carried on to the fields, whereby much damage will be done.

Again, the numbers of junks that lie inside the river select shallow places for an anchorage, where they wait for the tide to proceed on their way, an arrangement with which they are satisfied. If the water is deepened in mid-stream, the waves caused by foreign vessels as they go in or out will create a strong wash that will come rushing straight in, rendering it equally impossible for Chinese craft to stay where they are or to proceed, and many accidents will be sure to occur. Now, agriculture and navigation are matters of vital importance to the Chinese people which cannot be disregarded, and it may be seen from the conditions explained above that the unwillingness of the Chinese Government to dredge the Poo River does not in any way proceed from a reluctance to incur the expense, for even if [special] funds were provided to meet this expense the river could nevertheless not be dredged. The proposal to raise an additional tax in order to meet the cost of this work need not, therefore, as a matter of fact, be taken into consideration.

But even if the consideration of the question of levying an additional tax were for the moment admitted, there are still numerous obstacles to the plan which render its adoption impossible. These objections the Taotai will proceed to set forth in detail.

The question of the necessity or otherwise of dredging channels in the inland waters of China is one which it is entirely for China herself to decide. Moreover, in her compassionate consideration for mercantile interests, she imposes taxes that are lighter than any other countries can boast of, and these interests would suffer, instead of deriving benefit by an increase of taxation such as is now proposed in the interests of those foreign merchants who own large vessels. All the foreign vessels that enter the port are not large ones nor do all owners of produce charter large ships for its conveyance. It would therefore be a gross injustice to force all Chinese and foreign merchants alike to provide funds for the benefit of the few individuals or firms who own large vessels because they want to carry large cargoes and save expense.

At a general estimate by a tax of one per mil on the value of all produce imported into, or exported from, Shanghai, an additional revenue could be raised of 125,000 taels per annum. This tax is to be levied on Chinese and foreigners alike, and the Taotai has recently heard that even among the foreign merchants there are some who object to its imposition, whilst native merchants have never considered the question of the bar at all, so that if the latter are also called upon to pay an extra duty in common with foreign merchants it is impossible that they should willingly consent, and (under the circumstances) how could the authorities bear to compel them to do so. Therefore, even if the possibility of dredging the bar were admitted the question of increasing the duties could not be considered. How much less when the bar neither can nor must be dredged.

Sir T. Wade, who is so well acquainted with Chinese and foreign matters, must be thoroughly aware of the impossibility of carrying out this arrangement. If those foreign merchants who own the few large steamers that visit the port, would consider the conditions of the Woosung bar and adapt their cargoes to their conditions, their vessels might, as a matter of fact, come and go quite comfortably; or if they do not (choose to adapt their cargoes to the depth of the water), they may wait for a tide to get in, or lighten as permitted by the regulations. These have been the courses adopted by merchant vessels ever since the commencement of foreign trade, and the Taotai presumes that it cannot be Sir T. Wade's idea to force China to effect an impossibility or to go against the wishes of the majority of the mercantile class, because there is a sudden desire to dredge the accumulated silt of several hundred years in the interest of a few foreign firms who own large vessels and are anxious to save the cost of lightening.

The Yamen have to observe that the various points brought forward by his excellency the superintendent of trade for the southern ports, are, in effect, a true representation of the state of the case, and they imagine that the British minister who has been in China so many years will thoroughly understand (the grounds of the objections).

This memorandum is offered in reply (to the one prepared by the British minister) in hope that he will give it his careful attention.

Mr. Denny to Mr. Angell.

OCT. 9, 1880.

As the honorable commission which was created and sent out by the Government of the United States with a view to modifying the treaties with China is now prosecuting its labors at Peking, I have thought that perhaps a few figures and comments in addition to those forwarded by the consular body and Shanghai Chamber of Commerce to different foreign ministers early in April last looking to the conservancy of the Woosung bar to the end that foreign shipping and foreign trade with Shanghai might be relieved from some of the burdens at least which are now put upon it might not be considered out of place.

The gradual setting up of this bar has been for some years a source of much annoyance as well as great expense to vessels visiting Shanghai. Grievances have repeatedly been complained of by masters of merchant vessels from time to time. Not only this, but merchants and business men here, have, through their consuls and the Chamber of Commerce, presented to the diplomatic body the most urgent reasons why some steps should be taken to check the progress of an enemy which is day by day placing additional obstacles in the way of commerce in its effort to reach the commercial center of the east. These efforts have been greatly strengthened and encouraged by the foreign ministers, who have been exerting themselves to induce the Chinese authorities to sanction the removal of this obstruction. But thus far no satisfactory results have been attained by them. One sickly excuse after another, even to profanity itself, in calling this obstruction a "Heaven sent barrier," &c., has been put forward by the Peking Government in response to their unanswerable arguments, and this will probably continue to be the case, unless there is a united demand made upon the government by the representatives of the treaty powers for such a concession as a partial equivalent for the large sums of tonnage dues paid to it annually by foreign shipping seeking an entrance to this port. In fact it was for just such objects as this that the collection of tonnage dues was provided for in the treaties, and if these dues are to be diverted from the purpose for which they were intended, the right to collect them should be questioned.

There are at present in this harbor six American sailing ships, all of which were compelled upon their arrival at this bar to incur the expense of lightening, the deepest drawing 22 feet. The following table which I have carefully prepared from facts and figures obtained from the masters of these vessels will give you some idea at least of the expenses which the shipping to this port in such ships is now compelled to incur.

Ship.	Tons.	Tonnage dues.	Expense incurred.	Total expense.
Brown Brothers	1,493	$907 61	$876 00	$1,783 61
Paul Jones	1,258	764 77	355 50	1,120 27
Top Gallant	1,280	778 13	1,037 00	1,815 13
Blue Jacket	1,396	848 65	670 00	1,518 65
Henrietta	1,267	770 23	778 00	1,548 23
May Whitridge	862	524 02	880 00	1,404 02
	7,586	4,593 41	4,596 50	9,189 91

From the above statement it will be seen that while these vessels paid tonnage dues after arriving in port, in the aggregate of $4,593.41, the extra expenses they were put to in crossing the bar amounted to $4,596.50; which added to the tonnage dues, makes the total expenses for these six ships $9,189.91; and when we come to carry these burdens to the entire shipping of the port they become enormous. From the 30th September last year to the 30th September this year, the customs have collected tonnage-dues amounting to about $360,000, about one-half of which is at this port, and it is safe to say that not $50,000 of this sum is expended annually in adding to the shipping facilities of the harbor. Taking the foregoing table as our guide there is to be added to the dues collected at this port at least $180,000, expenses incurred by vessels at the bar, which makes the respectable sum of $360,000 annual tax upon this interest in order to reach Shanghai.

The expense to the Chinese Government in dredging this bar to a depth that would freely permit with seriously high tides, vessels drawing 22 to 23 feet to pass, would not be comparatively great; at all events, once the obstructions removed the labor afterwards would be easy. Suppose, however, that it should require all of the tonnage receipts for one, or even two years, to accomplish this important work, certainly the Chinese authorities owe this much at least to an interest which has paid them millions of dollars in the past, and will yet pay them millions more.

During the past summer it has frequently occurred that outgoing ships have been compelled to cross the bar and take cargo afterwards. On yesterday the steamer Indus, belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental line, went out over the bar for this purpose, and to-morrow one of the Mitsu Bishi steamers will pursue the same course. The expenses attending the shipment of cargo under such circumstances must be great.

Should the instructions of the commission preclude the consideration of such questions as this, I trust the facts I have here given, bearing upon the subject, may be some use to you in urging with your colleagues its consideration by the Peking Government.

No. 129.

The commission to Mr. Evarts.

No. 11.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 3, 1880.

SIR: Our dispatch No. 8, of October 23, 1880, brought the history of our negotiation down to the inverview of that day with the Chinese commissioners, and briefly summarized its result. We now have the honor to inclose a full précis of the conversation on that occasion.

When that précis was submitted to the Chinese commissioners, we asked for an interview (which was appointed for the 31st ultimo), in a note, a copy of which will be found inclosed.

The conference was held on the day appointed, and at its opening the Chinese commissioners submitted to us the project of a treaty, a translation of which will be found herewith. This being in Chinese, we could only gather its general purport from a rapid translation by Mr. Holcombe. Mr. Trescot, on behalf of the commissioners, informed the Chinese commissioners that we would take it into consideration, but that we could and ought to say at once that there were some points which were inadmissible, and could not be received by us even for consideration. The first was the limitation of the provisions of the treaty to Chinese immigration into California. To this the Chinese commissioners replied that such was not their intention, but as they had been led to suppose, from all they heard, that objection to such immigration existed chiefly, if not only, in California, they had suggested this form in order that its discussion might lead to a better understanding.

The second point was the provision that the limitation of such immigration should be confined only to the prevention of the entry of Chinese labor, and should not impose penalties or disabilities of any kind upon such immigrants. Mr. Trescot said that this provision was too obscure, and seemed to involve questions not within the scope of the present discussion. The right to prevent immigration, without the use of such means as the Government of the United States might deem judicious and necessary to enforce the prevention, was scarcely worth considering.

To this objection the reply of the Chinese was not precise enough for accurate report, but their apprehension seemed to be that such power of prevention might be made to justify or excuse unfavorable legislation by the States against such Chinese immigrants as might be found within their borders.

Another point was the exclusion of "artisans" from the class of Chinese labor whose immigration was forbiddon by the proposed provisions. In reference to this, Mr. Trescot stated that it was an inadmissible limitation upon that definition of Chinese labor which had been suggested by the United States commissioners.

It was deemed best by the United States commissioners not to do more at this interview than signify their great disappointment at the scope and tenor of the Chinese project, and to reserve a full review of its provisions until it had been translated.

After full consideration, the United States commissioners drafted a counter project with observations, which they sent to the Chinese commissioners by Mr. Holcombe, as secretary of the commission. This was accompanied by a note of instruction to Mr. Holcombe, a copy of which will be found inclosed. The result of his interview was the appointment of a meeting, to be held at an early day, the language of the members of the Yamen being such as to indicate the prospect of a satisfactory conclusion.

It may be well to state here that, in all our conferences, there have been present, besides the two commissioners, other members of the Yamen, making the Chinese representation never less than four and oftener six. The discussions, as far as they had practical point, were conducted to a large degree by Shen, a member of the privy council and one of the oldest and most influential of the Yamen, and Wang, who, although the youngest member, has the reputation of being one of the most distinguished statesmen of the country.

The discussions were, however, often very general, and participated in by all those present.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

JAMES B. ANGELL.
JOHN F. SWIFT.
WM. HENRY TRESCOT.

Précis of a conversation had between the United States commissioners and the Chinese commissioners, on Saturday, October 23, 1880.

Mr. Trescot, on behalf of the United States commissioners, said that they had received the memorandum of the Chinese commissioners on the project submitted, and thanked them for the promptness of their reply and the friendly spirit which marked it. That as to the first article, it was, as the Chinese commissioners said, only a summary or recapitulation of the provisions of existing treaties on the subject of the emigration and residence of the citizens of either country in the other. The article was suggested simply under the impression that, as the object of the present negotiation was one branch of immigration, it would be as well to make any treaty now negotiated a complete treatment of the whole subject. But if the Chinese Government preferred to leave the provisions standing as they now do in several treaties, and confine this negotiation to the immigration of Chinese labor, the United States commissioners would not object and would not of course press any further consideration of the first article.

That as to the second article, the United States commissioners want some fuller explanation of the meaning of the language used in the Chinese memorandum.

The memorandum says: "At the moment we are only prepared to negotiate for a mode of limitation, having in mind the interests of both governments. We are entirely ready to negotiate most carefully with your excellencies to the end that a limitation, either in point of time or of numbers, may be fixed to the emigration of Chinese laborers to the United States."

The United States commissioners would like to have a more definite statement of what such limitation meant, and how it was proposed to carry it into effect.

The Chinese commissioners replied that they had informed the secretary of the commission verbally that there would be difficulty in their accepting the word "prohibition," used in the second article; and, assuming that the word "regulate" would cover generally the other words "limit and suspend," they had suggested this limitation in hopes of learning from the United States commissioners what their idea of limitation was, and they would like to hear.

Mr. Trescot replied that the United States commissioners were not quite prepared to say, because, as the article they had submitted was a distinct proposition, they had been led by the language of the memorandum to suppose that the proposition for limitation in time and numbers was a substitute for that article and not a response to it, and that they had therefore expected that the Chinese commissioners would be prepared to explain it in some detail.

The Chinese commissioners said they did not intend their proposition to be considered as a substitute for Article II, or in any sense an ultimatum on the part of the Chinese Government. They rather intended it to induce a free discussion of the subject so it should be thoroughly understood. By limitation in number they meant, for example, that the United States having, as they supposed, a record of the number of immigrants in each year as well as the total number of Chinese now there, that no more should be allowed to go in any one year in future than either the greatest number which had gone in any year in the past, or the least number which had gone in any year in the past, or that the total number should never be allowed to exceed the number now there. As to limitation in time they meant, for example, that Chinese should be allowed to go in alternate years, or every third year, or, for example, that they should not be allowed to go for two, three, or five years.

Mr. Trescot replied that the United States commissioners feared there was some misunderstanding on the part of the Chinese commissioners as to the meaning of Article II. The United States Government did not ask the Chinese Government to regulate, limit, suspend, or prohibit immigration, but to leave that to the discretion and action of the United States Government itself. That under the Burlingame treaty, as construed in practice, the Chinese had the absolute right in any numbers to come to the United States. This had caused trouble and embarrassment. What the United States Government asked was that the Chinese Government should consent to such a modification of the Burlingame treaty as would enable it, without raising unpleasant questions of treaty construction, to exercise that discretion. The reasons why the United States Government should be allowed to do this rather than to impose the task upon the Government of China are manifest. If undertaken by China it would necessitate complicated regulations; the appointment of special officers at each port to enforce them, and, failure to enforce the rules on the part of the local officers would raise questions between the two governments. Besides, as the memorandum of the Chinese commissioners states, they could only apply to the ports of China, while the larger portion of emigrants go from Hong-Kong and Singapore.

It is far easier to prevent them from entering the United States than to prevent their leaving China. If the United States had the right it would most easily find the power to accomplish this result by appropriate legislation.

They thought it best for the friendly relations and the interests of both countries that the United States should have the right to limit, suspend, and prohibit and to enforce such limitation or prohibition by their own laws, in their own ports, without imposing further responsibility upon China.

The Chinese commissioners asked if the United States commissioners could give them any idea of the laws which would be passed to carry such power into execution.

Mr. Trescot replied that this could hardly be done. It would be as difficult to say what would be the special character of any act of Congress as it would be to say what would be the words of an edict of the Emperor of China to execute a treaty power. That two great nations discussing such a subject must always assume that they will both act in good faith and with due consideration for the interests and friendship of each other. That the United States Government might never deem it necessary to exercise this power. It would depend upon circumstances.

If Chinese immigration concentrated in cities where it threatened public order, or if it confined itself to localities where it was an injury to the interests of the American people, the Government of the United States would undoubtedly take steps to prevent such accumulations of Chinese. If, on the contrary, there was no large immigration, or if there were sections of the country where such immigration was clearly beneficial, then the legislation of the United States under this power would be adapted to such circumstances. For example, there might be a demand for Chinese labor in the South and a surplus of such labor in California, and Congress might legislate in accordance with these facts. In general the legislation would be in view of, and depend upon, the circumstances of the situation at the moment such legislation became necessary.

The Chinese commissioners said this explanation was satisfactory; that they had not intended to ask for a draft of any special act, but for some general idea how the power would be exercised. What had just been said gave them the explanation which they wanted, and they asked that it might be given to them in writing. Mr. Trescot replied that a précis of the entire conversation would be given to them. They further remarked that they were satisfied that if any special legislation worked unanticipated hardship the Government of the United States would listen in the most just and friendly spirit to the representations of the Chinese Government through their minister in Washington.

Mr. Trescot expressed the gratification of the United States commissioners at this confidence, which was not misplaced. The United States Government had been very careful of the feelings of the Chinese Government. They had not, like some of the English colonies, undertaken to settle the matter absolutely by their own legislation. Congress had passed the fifteen-passenger act, which the President had vetoed, not because he did not feel very strongly the difficulties consequent upon the present condition of the question, nor because he did not regard unrestricted Chinese immigration as a great evil, but in order that this commission might first be sent to find in consultation with the Chinese Government a friendly and fair adjustment. That the Chinese commissioners must be aware that the subject was one of great popular interest in the United States and had been the theme of excited and even angry comment in Congress. And it was much to be feared that if the commission failed to reach a satisfactory conclusion, the government might be forced by the difficulties of the situation to take the question into its own hands and abrogate the Burlingame treaty. The government did not desire this, but only sought a certain elasticity of action under the treaty as the exigencies of the situation might demand.

The United States commissioners thought it would be a most fortunate thing for the continued friendship of the two countries if they could communicate a satisfactory conclusion of these negotiations to their government before the next meeting of Congress in December. That as for the special words to be used, the United States commissioners would receive with the utmost consideration any suggestions from the Chinese commissioners, but it would be very gratifying if an agreement could be reached as to the principle of the article which they had submitted.

The Chinese commissioners said, the commission might be assured that China did not in any way mistrust the motives and purpose of the United States, nor for an instant doubt that the Government of the United States would act with entire fairness towards the Chinese. If the Government and people of the United States had treated Chinese laborers as they had been treated elsewhere, the Government of China would be anxious that their people should not go thither. China would never forget that it was the Government of the United States through its representatives abroad that first called the attention of the Government of China to the cruelties to which its subjects were subjected in Cuba and elsewhere. They appreciated fully the spirit in which the United States Government had treated the subject; that the United States commissioners might be assured that they had but one purpose, and that was to reach at an early period a satisfactory solution of the question, and that such solution might be certainly anticipated, so that the United States commissioners would not be detained by the closing of navigation, and they asked that a précis of this conversation might be furnished them.

The United States commissioners to the Chinese commissioners.

The undersigned, the United States commissioners, have the honor in conformity with the request of their colleagues, the Chinese commissioners, to inclose for their consideration a précis of the conversation had at the interview of the 23d instant, which they hope will be found correct.

In doing so the United States commissioners cannot refrain from expressing their gratification at the spirit in which the discussion was conducted and the fair and just view taken by the Chinese commissioners of the representations submitted to their consideration.

Feeling that there is every reason to hope for a satisfactory solution of the questions they have now considered with their colleagues, the commissioners of the United States, without pressing unduly upon the time and other engagements of the Chinese commissioners, would ask that, as both parties are now fully in possession of each other's views, as early an interview as possible may be accorded them, in order that they may take joint action with their colleagues upon the definite proposition contained in article second of the project.

We have the honor, &c.,

Treaty project from foreign office.

Whereas in the 8th year of Hsien Feng A. D. 1858, a treaty of peace and friendship was concluded between China and the United States, and to which were added in the 7th year of Tung Chih, A. D. 1868, certain supplementary acticles to the advantage of both parties, which supplementary articles were to be perpetually observed and obeyed;

And whereas the Government of the United States, because of the constantly increasing immigration of Chinese laborers to the State of California, and the embarrassments consequent on such immigration, now desires to negotiate an adjustment of the existing treaties which shall not be in direct contravention of their spirit:

Now, therefore, the Government of China has appointed ——— ——— as its commissioners plenipotentiary, and the Government of the United States has appointed ——— ——— as its commissioners plenipotentiary, and the said plenipotentiaries, having conjointly examined their full powers, have discussed the points of possible modification in existing treaties, and have agreed upon the following articles in temporary modification:

ARTICLE I. The United States, in regulating the immigration of Chinese laborers to California, will limit the number who may enter the ports of the State, but will not prohibit such immigration. Only such Chinese will be included in this limitation as are found, after careful examination at the time of their entry into the ports of California, under rules to be established by the United States, to be actual laborers. Any regulations for limiting such immigration shall only be of such a nature as to hinder the entry of immigrants of the class specified to the ports named, and shall not impose disabilities of any other kind or class upon such immigrants.

ART. II. Chinese who may be desirous of proceeding to any other part of the United States for purposes of labor, excepting only the State of California, shall be allowed to go of their own free will and accord. Persons of all other classes, with the exception of actual Chinese laborers, whose immigration into California will be temporarily regulated and limited by the United States, whether proceeding to California as teachers, students, travelers, traders, or artisans, as well as all Chinese laborers now in that State, will be allowed to go and come with entire freedom, and will not be included in the limiting regulations.

ART. III. If Chinese laborers now either permanently or temporarily residing in the State of California meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the United States shall exert all its power to devise measures for their protection, and to secure for them the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty.

ART. IV. The limitations to be placed upon the immigration of Chinese laborers will be temporary in their nature. The number of immigrants allowed by the regulations will not be excessively small, nor the term of years excessively long. Such regulations will apply only to Chinese laborers at work for and employed by American citizens. All other classes may go and come to and from the State of California, and their servants and employés, whether accompanying them or following them, shall not be included in the limiting regulations.

ART. V. The Government of the United States will prepare regulations in the spirit of the foregoing articles, and communicate them to the Chinese minister at Washington for his consideration. If there are points in such regulations which need modification, they will be brought by the Chinese minister at Washington to the notice of the Secretary of State, and be adjusted. The Chinese foreign office may also bring such points to the notice of the United States minister at Peking, and adjust them in concert with him, to the end of securing mutual advantage and avoiding injury to either party; and thereafter such regulations will go into effect.

ART. VI. The two governments having agreed upon the foregoing articles, copies have been prepared in each language, and signed, sealed, and exchanged by the respective plenipotentiaries. They will, however, go into effect only after their ratification by the governments concerned.

ARTICLE I. Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States or their residence therein, affects, or threatens to affect, the interest of that country or to endanger the good order of the said country, or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, and the words Chinese laborers are herein used to signify all immigration other than that for teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity.

ART. II. Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States for purposes of teaching, study, travel, curiosity, or trade, with their body servants, shall be allowed to go and come with entire freedom.

ART. III. If Chinese laborers now either permanently or temporarily residing in the State of California meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty.

ART. IV. The Government of the United States will communicate to the Chinese Government the legislative measures adopted by it in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing articles, and in case such measures work unexpected hardship to Chinese subjects, will give the fullest consideration to such representations as the Government of China may see fit to make in the premises.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have sealed and signed the foregoing at Peking, in English and Chinese, being three copies of each text of even tenure and date.

UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 2, 1880.

DEAR SIR: You will receive with this a memorandum containing the views of the commissioners as to the project of treaty submitted to our consideration by the Chinese commissioners. You will submit it to them in order that they may be prepared for a discussion of our points of difference at the next interview. In your conference with them we think it would be advisable without a formal expression of our opinion, which we reserve for an interview, to impress upon them your conviction that our project goes as far in the way of concession as we can go, and the stipulation of Article I is the least that we can accept in the fulfillment of our instructions.

JAMES B. ANGELL.
JOHN F. SWIFT.
WM. H. TRESCOT.

MEMORANDUM.

The United States commissioners have received and considered the project of a treaty from the Chinese commissioners. They submit a counter project with the following observations:

1. The United States commissioners are willing to consult the wishes of the Chinese Government in preserving the principle of free intercourse between the people of the two countries as established by existing treaties, provided that the right of the United States Government to use its discretion in guarding against any possible evils of immigration of Chinese laborers is distinctly recognized. Therefore if such concession removes all difficulty on the part of the Chinese commissioners (but only in that case) the United States commissioners will agree to remove the word "prohibit" from their article and to use the words "regulate, limit, or suspend."

The Chinese commissioners have in their project explicitly recognized the right of the United States Government to use some discretion, and have proposed a limitation as to time and number. This is the right to "regulate, limit, or suspend," but it is accompanied in the project by conditions which cannot be accepted. The United States commissioners think that the Chinese Government ought to assume that this right will be exercised by the United States Government in a friendly and judicious manner, but it would be entirely useless to the United States Government without the power of using it when and how, in the judgment of the government, it ought to be used. Consultation and conference between the two governments upon every occasion when it might be necessary or upon every detail in the method of its use would be so inconvenient as almost to be impossible.

2. The United States commissioners feel it their duty to insist upon their definition of Chinese laborers, viz: "the word Chinese laborers are herein used to signify all immigration other than that for teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity hereinbefore referred to and provided for in existing treaties." They cannot consent that artisans shall be excluded from the class of Chinese laborers, for it is this very competition of skilled labor in the cities where the Chinese labor immigration concentrates which has caused the embarrassment and popular discontent they wish to avoid. But they are willing to adopt an article providing that the classes who are authorized to come to and reside in the United States shall bring the servants who are necessary to their convenience.

3. The United States commissioners cannot consent to the limitation that Chinese laborers excluded shall be those only who are employed by American citizens. This so far from being a check upon such immigration would be simply a prohibition of the use of cheap labor by the American citizens. Every other person, that is, any and every resident, French, English, German, Chinese, would have the right to bring into the country and use such labor in direct competition with the American citizen. The United States commissioners can scarcely think that this proposition was fully considered by the Chinese commissioners.

4. The United States commissioners would further call to the attention of the Chinese commissioners the necessity of correcting all those phrases in their treaty project which would seem to confine the negotiation to Chinese immigration into California. As they intimated at the last interview, they could not even take into consideration a treaty so limited in its scope, and they have proceeded with the examination of the project upon the assurance then received that no such limitation was intended by the Chinese commissioners.

The commission to Mr. Evarts.

No. 12.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 6, 1880. (Received December 22.)

SIR: We have the honor to imform you that we have to-day agreed with the Chinese commissioners upon the articles of a treaty, a copy of which will be found inclosed, and which will be formally signed in a very few days.

We have scarcely time to make such comment upon this treaty as we desire, but it is so simple as to explain itself.

The Chinese Government recognized at an early period of the negotiation that the United States had a right to ask for such modification of the Burlingame treaty as would relieve it from the embarrassment of an undue and disproportionate immigration of Chinese labor into the United States. This principle once admitted, as it was frankly, we felt it our duty to afford every facility to the Chinese Government to reconcile this admission to the requirements of their position towards their own subjects. The essential point was that the United States should have the right "to regulate, limit, or suspend" the immigration of Chinese labor without absolutely abrogating the treaties by which immigration into the United States was recognized, and this, we think, will be found amply provided for in Article I.

We desired, as you will see by the précis of the negotiation, to define with more precision exactly what all the negotiators on both sides understood by "Chinese laborers." But the Chinese Government was very unwilling to be more precise than the absolute necessity called for, and they claimed that in Article II they did by exclusion provide that nobody should be entitled to claim the benefit of the general provisions of the Burlingame treaty but those who went to the United States for purposes of teaching, study, mercantile transactions, travel, or curiosity. We have no doubt that an act of Congress, excluding all but these classes, using the words of the treaty, would be fully warranted by its provisions, and as this was a clear and sufficient modification of the sixth article of the Burlingame treaty we did not feel authorized to risk such a concession by insisting upon language which would really mean no more, and which was entirely unacceptable to the Chinese commissioners.

There is not in the treaty any language which modifies this concession, and there was not, as we think, the slightest intention on the part of the Chinese commissioners to diminish the full force of the discretion given to the United States.

There were one or two minor points upon which we would have preferred our own language. For instance, we wished in Article I to say "Chinese laborers should be protected against any abuse or maltreatment," instead of "should not be subject to any abuse or maltreatment"; but this latter phrase had been used in the treaty with Great Britain, and although we thought it weaker than the form we proposed, we did not think it worth while to insist upon our preference in view of the concession of the principle which we think securely established that the Government of the United States had the power to regulate, limit, or suspend, without conditions, Chinese labor immigration when deemed injurious to the interests of its citizens.

We will by the next mail send you a full account of the negotiations from the period of our last dispatch No. 11, of date of November 3.

We are in further negotiation as to a matter submitted by the Chinese Government in connection with the probable extension of their trade in native vessels with the United States. We will probably reach a conclusion this week, when we will send you further information.

The questions of lekin taxes, transit passes, and judicial procedure are under consideration of the diplomatic corps here, and as these questions affect all treaty powers alike, the Chinese Government is unwilling to make them the subject of special negotiation with any one. These topics will, after full conference, be made the subject of a special dispatch, but there is no probability of their reaching a point of practical discussion for many months.

We can see at present no object to be served by the residence of the commission in Peking during the winter. Any discussions may be safely left in the hands of Mr. Angell, and the government will have ample time to determine what its policy on these matters will be.

We have therefore deemed it best that the two commissioners should return at once with the treaty negotiated, and Mr. Swift and Mr. Trescot will accordingly return to the United States upon the signature of the two treaties referred to.

Although we propose to write again by the earliest mail, we cannot close this dispatch without acknowledging our obligation to Mr. Holcombe, not only for the ordinary services of secretary and interpreter, but for the active and intelligent interest he has taken in the duties he has been called on to discharge in addition to those of secretary of the legation, and for the great help he has been in putting our views before the Chinese Government, and advising with us as to our method of negotiation, advice which his long experience and recognized ability made of the utmost value. We venture to hope that the Department will do that justice to his services which we have already recommended.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

No. 48.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 16, 1880. (Received January 5, 1881.)

SIR: In my No. 41 to you, dated November 1, 1880, I furnished such information as I had then been able to gain, in answer to the inquiry whether the Chinese Government discriminates against us in tonnage dues and duties on imports. I was able to report that there was no discrimination against us in the dues and duties collected by the so-called foreign customs, unless possibly there was an exception in the case of Chinese steamers bringing government rice from the Yangtsze ports to Tientsin, but that full and exact information concerning the treatment of junks, was not then at hand. A circular to our consuls and a note to Prince Kung, designed to bring out the facts in respect to junks, were transmitted to you as inclosures in No. 41.

I have now the pleasure of inclosing Prince Kung's reply to my inquiry, and also the replies which the consul-general, and the consuls at Foochow, Chinkiang, Hankow, and Newchwang have sent to the circular.

The prince replies in substance that foreigners and Chinese transporting goods in Chinese craft are treated alike and that the duties they pay are just what is paid on goods of a foreign merchant unprotected by a customs certificate; that is, on goods imported and then sent inland without a transit pass; and further that the tonnage dues paid by Chinese craft are the same as those paid by foreign vessels, that they are paid at every customs station by the Chinese vessels, and that the rate is the same whether the vessels are under foreign or Chinese charter.

So far as this is a declaration of the law, it may be taken as satisfactory. But the testimony of some of our consuls and of intelligent persons, with whom I have conversed on the subject, compels the belief that the law is not taken as the strict guide of the officials of the so-called Chinese customs, who collect the dues and duties from Chinese junks.

The answers of Consul-General Denny, Consul Wingate, and Consul Shepard are clear on this point. There can be no doubt that in many cases the Chinese customs officers, without regard to the law, collect by "squeezes" what they can in payment of dues and duties. Whether this mode of collection results in an advantage or a disadvantage to the native vessels as compared with foreign, is a point on which men equally well qualified to judge differ. Probably in some cases it works one way and in others in a different way. When the official can safely "squeeze" the native trader or vessel into the payment of higher charges than are exacted from the foreigner by the foreign customs, he does not neglect the opportunity; but when the competition of foreign vessels with the native is close, he may accept something less than the foreigner pays, in order to prevent commerce from turning too largely to the vessels which report to the foreign customs. Consul Shepard, of Hankow, while acknowledging the difficulty of obtaining exact information, is of opinion that the native vessels in his district have an advantage over foreign vessels. Consul Wingate, of Foochow, believes that at that port the native vessels pay heavier dues than the foreign, pay heavier duties on the exportation of poles (a large traffic at Foochow), and are forbidden to export certain articles to foreign countries. The only advantage which he concedes to them is that of visiting the non-treaty ports. It will be remembered too that the junks are required by law to pay tonnage dues at every port which they enter, and do probably pay whatever is "squeezed" from them at every port, while the foreign vessels engaged in coastwise trade pay only once in four months, though they may enter several ports in that time. I suppose that Consul-General Denny's remark is substantially correct that at the present time the trade carried on by the junks "is of a purely native character between coast and inland ports and does not materially affect the interest of foreigners." Still, the time has been when our vessels did a good deal of the inland and coastwise transportation and that time may come again.

I have received from Mr. Robert Hart, inspector-general of the foreign customs, a reply to my verbal inquiry, whether exemption from duty on the part of the cargo of the Chinese merchants' steamers, which bring government rice from the Yangtsze ports to Tientsin, is still continued. I inclose a copy. He answers in the affirmative and argues to show that the exemption practically works no discrimination against foreign vessels. Probably it is intended as a sort of subsidy, and if it were abolished, the subsidy would be continued in some form. A direct subsidy we could not regard as a discrimination against us, but I must regard a subsidy in this form as a discrimination in respect to coastwise duties. But it is the only discrimination recognized in the foreign customs, and does not in fact prevent competing lines of foreign steamers from plying between Shanghai and Tientsin.

I conceive that any remedy for the irregularities in the methods of administering the Chinese customs must be found in measures tending to place them under the direct charge of the Imperial Government. If such measures were adopted, the foreign powers might then under proper treaty stipulations hold them responsible for any maladministration which should work injury to foreign interests.

The bearing of the facts above recited and of the conclusion drawn, upon the negotiations of the commissioners plenipotentiary concerning commercial intercourse will readily be perceived.

Trusting that the information I have been able to gather, though necessarily less exact in relation to Chinese junks than could be desired, may suffice for the present purposes of the Department.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No 48.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

Referring to the arrival of the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company's steamship Hochung at San Francisco, your excellency, some time since, addressed certain inquiries to this office to ascertain whether the duties and tonnage dues levied on American goods and vessels differed in any way from those levied on Chinese goods and vessels or those of any other nation, and, it will be remembered, that this office explained in reply that no discrimination whatever was made by the foreign customs in levying duties and tonnage dues on the goods and vessels of all nationalities alike.

Later another dispatch was received from your excellency, inquiring further, whether the duties and tonnage dues levied by the Chinese customs on vessels, or on foreign goods imported, native produce exported, or foreign and native goods carried coastwise, differed in any respect from the duties and tonnage dues levied by the foreign customs.

In reply, I have the honor to state that foreign goods imported, native produce exported, or foreign and native goods carried coastwise, when transported in Chinese craft sailing under foreign flag pay duties at the foreign customs; when transported in Chinese craft proper they pay duties at every customs station, and lekin barrier just like the goods of a foreign merchant when unprotected by customs certificate.

As regards tonnage dues, the ch'uan liao (tonnage dues) levied on Chinese craft is the ch'uan ch'ao (tonnage dues) paid by foreign vessels, and this is paid by the former at every customs station (Chinese) according to the regulation of the station, and the rate paid is the same whether the craft be under foreign or native charter.

Mr. Denny to Mr. Angell.

No. 33.] OCTOBER 25, 1880.

SIR: Referring to your dispatch No. 11, submitting interrogatories relating to the arrival at San Francisco of the Chinese steamer Hochung, I have the honor to submit the following:

First. There are no other or higher tonnage dues exacted in the open ports of China from the vessels of the United States resorting thereto than are paid by Chinese vessels (not junks) or any foreign vessels engaged in like trade therewith.

Tonnage dues on vessels are collected by the Imperial Maritime Customs, at the rate of 4 mace per ton of 40 cubic feet, if over 150 tons, and 1 mace per ton, if 150 tons or under.

Second. American citizens pay the same import duties on all merchandise imported by them as are paid by the Chinese and subjects or citizens of all other powers, according to those specified in the tariff. No higher duties are exacted or paid by them.

Third. There is no discriminating or additional customs duty imposed on American or other merchandise imported into China in American vessels, a uniform tariff exists for all nations.

The dues and duties levied by the native customs at the treaty and non-treaty ports upon junks and merchandise carried in them vary considerably. Their trade, however, is of a purely, native character, between coast and inland ports, and does not materially affect the interest of foreigners.

I informed the Department in a dispatch dated the 15th of May last of the intention of the China Merchant Steam Navigation Company to establish a line of steamers between China and San Francisco via Honolulu, and the Hochung is the first one of that line to arrive in United States waters. The Meifoo (Benclutha) a fine iron ship of 2,000 tons, just built at Shanghai, will be the next to follow. There are to be three in all, I believe.

While it is gratifying to see China step out of the narrow path she has trod in this direction for ages past, and modestly bid for a portion of the carrying trade between the United States and her own country, it is humiliating to Americans, with all their boasted enterprise on sea and land, to have Chinese steamers entering our harbors, while there is not a single steam merchant ship entering Chinese waters, flying the American colors.

Now, that the Chinese have concluded to enter upon this new departure, it is certainly an appropriate time to settle discriminations, if there be any.

In this connection I may add, that as tonnage dues collected from Chinese ships entering harbors of the United States will be, like others, expended in the improvement of her harbors and bars, so those paid by United States vessels entering Chinese harbors should be used for the same purpose, as originally intended by the treaties with China.

I am, &c.,

O. N. DENNY.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 48.]

Mr. Wingate to Mr. Angell.

No. 9.] OCTOBER 27, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 6, of the 11th instant, making inquires regarding comparative dues and duties levied upon American ships and their cargoes.

Foreign vessels of all nationalities, and Chinese vessels with foreign rig, so far as relates to tonnage dues, and import and export duties, are, I understand, treated precisely alike at this port, and so far as relates to them, I answer all your interrogatories in the negative.

The customs collect no tonnage dues from junks, but they are subject to certain exactions called, "squeezes," from the native customs. Junks from foreign ports, as Singapore or Hong-Kong have to pay for entry. For this there is no known fixed rate, it depending somewhat upon the influence of the owners or supercargoes.

But the sum exacted is reported to be in excess of that collected from foreign vessels, so that it is for the interest of the merchant to import most articles of foreign manufacture in foreign or foreign rigged vessels. Junks have some advantage in visiting non-treaty ports. They are placed at a disadvantage in some other respects; they pay higher export duty on poles, and they are not allowed to export certain articles to foreign countries.

Citizens of the United States have equal advantages with Chinese subjects, or citizens or subjects of the most favored nations, in importing and exporting merchandise, except as may be noted in my remarks relating to junks.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your Nos. 3 and 4. Referring to the latter I respectfully submit the following:

First. In answer to your first query, experience and conference with the custom-house officials lead me to reply that all foreign vessels, of whatever nationality, are required to enter at the foreign customs, and also all vessels of foreign type owned by the Chinese (i. e. the steamers of the "China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company"), and the tonnage dues exacted are on precisely the same scale and terms for all.

I suppose this answers the question you wish to solve, but I think it proper to explain that altogether another system is applied to native craft proper, engaged in purely native trade. These do not enter the foreign but native customs, and pay what we call "port dues" and "boat tax." Exactly what these dues are it is difficult to learn, on account of the reticence of the native officials in such matters, but they most undoubtedly give an advantage to the native over foreign vessels in local trade. I have endeavored, before answering you, to get definite information on the topic but unsuccessfully.

Second and third. The answer to both your second and third queries with the postscript is: "None whatever."

No. 35.] NOVEMBER 2, 1880.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your dispatch No. 5, dated the 11th ultimo, relative to tonnage and other duties, levied and collected by the Chinese authorities at this port.

There are no direct imports or exports to or from this port and foreign ports. All imports of foreign goods, or exports of native product, are made through Shanghai and the southern Chinese coast ports. Consequently, there are no sea-going vessels plying between this and foreign ports, except an occasional English or French steamer from Hong-Kong.

The carrying trade of the Yangtsze ports is done by English and Chinese steamers, (the last named being also foreign built) plying regularly between Shanghai and Hankow, also by native build, but foreign owned, sailing vessels known as lorchas, usually not exceeding 150 tons burden. There is also a considerable portion of this trade done by Chinese junks, frequently charted by foreigners, though never carrying foreign flags.

Many of the lorchas fly the United States flag. They are commanded by citizens of the United States, though the crew in every instance, are Chinese subjects. And they are provided with consular certificates of ownership by resident United States citizens in China. It is observable however, that many of them are mortgaged to the full extent of their value to some Chinese subject.

Admitting nevertheless, that in every case the alleged ownership is genuine, this class of vessels can hardly be called "American," in the sense contemplated by our statutes; they could not obtain a register or license under our laws; and should they visit any of the United States ports would have to be classed as foreign vessels. Consequently, whilst they are entitled to protection as property owned by United States citizens in China, they cannot, I apprehend, lay claim to many of the privileges and immunities pertaining to bona fide American vessels.

So much by way of preliminary. Recurring more directly to your inquiries, I am assured by the customs authorities here, that "tonnage dues are levied at a uniform rate as laid down by treaty on all foreign vessels, and on Chinese vessels of foreign build." Also "that custom duties on re-imports and re-exports, &c., are uniform, and with out discrimination against foreign traders or powers."

This is an ex-parte statement of course. It is just a little evasive also. But I have no means of probing the matter further, as I am instructed by the State Department to proceed at once to Canton, and am expecting to leave by to-morrow's steamer. I apprehend however, that the statement may be correct so far as it goes.

There have been no complaints of discriminations, and, it is noticeable that the number and business of the so-called American lorchas are on the increase here as at other ports.

I am, &c.,

WILLIAM L. SCRUGGS.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's dispatch, No. 7, referring to the questions raised by the arrival of the Chinese steamer Ho Chung at San Francisco, and in reply to state that:

First. No other or higher tonnage dues are exacted in the open ports of China from the vessels of the United States resorting thereto than are paid by Chinese vessels or any foreign vessels engaged in like trade therewith.

Second. No other or higher customs duties of import or export are exacted in China from American citizens importing merchandise thither, or exporting merchandise thence, than are paid by Chinese subjects or the citizens of the most favored power importing or exporting the like merchandise into or from China.

Third. No discriminating or additional customs duty is imposed upon merchandise, whether of American or foreign origin, entering or leaving the open ports of China in vessels of the United States, which is not imposed upon the like goods entering or leaving those ports in Chinese vessels or in vessels of any foreign power.

The above replies describe not only the law but the practice of the authorities, so far as I know, especially in my consular district.

NOVEMBER 8, 1880.

DEAR MR. ANGELL: In reply to your inquiry concerning special advantages allowed to the Chinese Merchants' Company's steamers, I have now to give you the result of my reference to the Tientsin customs. It is, in a word, this: The rule is still in existence and has never been rescinded, notwithstanding my belief that it has fallen into desuetude.

The rule stands thus: Chinese junks bringing government rice from the Yangtsze to Tientsin are allowed to carry a two-tenths cargo of native produce free of duty; that is to say, a junk may bring 200 bags of produce free of duty for every 800 bags of rice carried. Chinese steamers carrying government rice are to be dealt with similarly. It is only the custom-houses at Ningpo, Shanghai, and Chinkiang (starting point) and Tientsin (destination) that are to pass produce in this way, and the exemption applies solely to Chinese produce and not to foreign goods.

I do not think it likely an exemption of this kind creates any specially favorable condition for Chinese vessels as against foreign flags, seeing that it is limited to a few ports and a special cargo, while that cargo only comes forward at a special season, and the exemption of the two-tenths produce accompanying it is part of the payment of freight on the government eight-tenths rice. Owners of such produce have probably to pay the amount of the duty exempted to the steamer company, in addition to ordinary freight, and the arrangement appears to be a sort of guarantee to the rice carrier; that whether the government is in funds or not he, himself, can secure the payment of whatever freight (sometimes more, sometimes less, according to the nature of the produce) the duty exempted may be held to represent. A freighter would, therefore, find it as cheap to send his produce by another vessel.

Yours, &c.,

ROBERT HART.

The Commission to Mr. Evarts.

No. 13.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 17, 1880. (Received January 5, 1881.)

SIR: On November 6, in dispatch No. 12, we informed you that we had on that day concluded a treaty with the Chinese Government, which would be signed in a few days, and a copy of which was inclosed.

On November 10 we telegraphed a brief summary of the treaty (inclosure 1), and have now the honor to inform you that to-day, the 17th of November, this treaty was signed in triplicate, in Chinese and English, by the commissioners plenipotentiary of the two governments.

Our former dispatches will have given you a sufficient history of the negotiations, but we deem it our duty to conclude with a review of the points which came under discussion.

After our first interview with the Chinese commissioners we thought it clear that while the Chinese Government would recognize the propriety of some regulating discretion as to Chinese immigration on the part of the Government of the United States, it would not consent to its formal prohibition and the absolute abrogation of the provisions of the Burlingame treaty relating to the free intercourse between the people of the two countries. We did not think that the public opinion of the United States would require so extreme a demand, and we considered our instructions as warning us not to disregard the traditional policy of the United States, and in your own words to give due weight to "the widely diffused and, so to speak, natural sentiment of our people in favor of the most liberal admission of foreign immigrants who desire to incorporate themselves and their families with our society, and mingle the stream of their posterity in the swelling tide of native population."

While, therefore, we asked in our first proposition for a recognition of the right to prohibit, we were prepared at the proper time to withdraw this extreme claim in concession to a final advance on the part of the Chinese commissioners to such a degree of discretionary power on the part of the United States as we deemed practically sufficient to secure the control of Chinese immigration.

The statement of the wishes and purposes of the Government of the United States was, at the opening of the negotiation, met by the Chinese commissioners with the expression, in very friendly language, of their willingness to negotiate, provided no modification of the Burlingame treaty was asked, and certain propositions formerly submitted by Mr. Seward in reference to paupers, lewd women, diseased persons, and contract laborers were taken as the basis of the negotiation.

While acknowledging the amicable spirit in which their reply was made, we deemed it all important that the Chinese commissioners should understand that a proper modification of the Burlingame treaty was precisely the thing we had come to obtain, and that Mr. Seward's propositions in no way furnished the basis of any negotiation which we were willing to undertake. And in this connection we found it necessary to call the attention of the Chinese commissioners to the use of language in their formal reply not usual between governments, and to indicate our belief that this language had been used under an impression that the government was not in fact the representative of the sentiment of the country, an impression which they ought at once to correct. We believed that upon this discussion turned the possibility of negotiating a satisfactory treaty.

As we expected, the Chinese Government promptly disavowed any intention of offense in the language used, and after a full and friendly exchange of opinion, the discussion proceeded to the consideration of such a modification of the Burlingame treaty as would be acceptable to both governments.

Without going into a detailed history of the negotiations which has been furnished to the Department from time to time in our former dispatches, we may say that the Chinese Government submitted a scheme which provided:

1st. That the immigration should be "regulated" by the Government of the United States, such regulations, however, to be communicated to the Chinese Government for approval before going into effect.

2d. That "artisans" should not be included among Chinese laborers.

3d. That the regulation should apply only to Chinese laborers in the employ of American citizens.

4th. That if the regulation should extend to the limitation or suspension of such immigration, the limitation in point of numbers or the suspension in point of time should be specific.

As to the second and third points of this scheme it is unnecessary to repeat the obvious reasons why they could not even be taken into consideration.

At this point in the discussion we deemed it best to say that while the details of the treaty and its language were matters in which we would gladly consult the preferences of the Chinese Government, we could not consent to any settlement which did not recognize the entire discretion of the United States in dealing with this subject. We thought that any regulations to be matter of joint arrangement would only raise new questions and that the administration of any such joint regulations would in practice prove unsatisfactory. Besides which they could only be of force in Chinese ports and would be useless in regard either to Hong-Kong or Singapore. We thought that the simplest, the directest, and the only efficient plan was to give the control of the subject to the Government of the United States.

We therefore communicated to the Chinese commissioners that we would consent to strike out the word "prohibit," provided they would accept the words "regulate, limit, or suspend," being satisfied that these words covered the power to devise and enforce all necessary and proper legislation.

Upon their acceptance of this proposition, we consented to such variation of the phraseology of the articles as they desired. You will observe that this language imposes no conditions upon the discretion of the United States. That the discretion should be used reasonably; that all classes of Chinese subjects not within the scope of this treaty should be protected in the enjoyment of such rights as are now conferred by existing treaties, and that the diplomatic representative of the Chinese Government should have the right from time to time to call the attention of the United States Government to any unanticipated hardship that the legislation of the United States might cause, are provisions which need no comment.

As to the fourth point of the Chinese project, we were satisfied that the necessity for such special limitation or suspension, varying according to the actual condition of the country and the character and extent of the immigration at the date of such proposed limitation or suspension, it would be impossible to devise a satisfactory specification. We thought that the principle of its right to use its discretion being once admitted as belonging to the Government of the United States, the Chinese Government should assume that we would exercise that discretion with justice, and in a spirit of friendship.

We were fortunate enough to satisfy the Chinese commissioners not only of the justice of our views, but of the entire good faith in which they were advanced.

In conclusion, we deem it our duty to say to you that during the whole of this negotiation the representatives of the Chinese Government have met us in the fairest and most friendly spirit. They have been, in their personal intercourse, most courteous, and have given to all our communications, verbal as well as written, the promptest and most respectful consideration. After a free and able exposition of their own views, we are satisfied that in yielding to the request of the United States they have been actuated by a sincere friendship and an honorable confidence that the large powers recognized by them as belonging to the United States, and bearing directly upon the interests of their own people, will be exercised by our government with a wise discretion, in a spirit of reciprocal and sincere friendship, and with entire justice.

[Extract.]

No. 14.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 17, 1880. (Received January 5.)

SIR: We have by dispatch of same date informed you of the signature of the immigration treaty. We have now the honor to add that on the same day we signed another treaty with the Chinese Government containing certain commercial clauses and clauses relating to judicial proceeding, which we thought it desirable to obtain.

At the conclusion of the negotiations in reference to the immigration of Chinese labor, and when the terms of the negotiations in reference to the immigration of Chinese labor, and when the terms of the various articles had been definitely agreed upon, and the treaty transferred to the secretaries for the preparation of the formal draft, the Chinese commissioners informed us that there was one subject which they wished to bring to our attention, and upon which they deemed it desirable, if possible, to obtain some treaty stipulation.

They then referred to the voyage of the Chinese merchant's steamship, the Hochung; her arrival at San Francisco, and the correspondence between the two governments upon the subject, and expressed the wish to put the rights of the commerce of the two countries as to tonnage dues and imports in the condition of reciprocity.

We took the matter into consideration, and came to the conclusion that an article which would simply put such rights in the condition they would be, if the President, recognizing that no discrimination existed, had issued his proclamation, would not be unacceptable to the government. We were satisfied that there is in law no discrimination against us in respect to tonnage dues or imports (unless a species of subsidy to the China Merchants' Steamship Company in connection with the transportation of tribute rice from the Yangtsze River to Tientsin be regarded as such), and that there is in fact none which at present is working any harm to us. If any discrimination has been thus far unlawfully attempted, the article under consideration seems to furnish the best remedy for the trouble.

The customs department is divided into two branches, popularly known as the foreign and the Chinese. The former, which is administered by foreigners in the service of the Chinese Government, collects all dues and duties from foreign vessels and from Chinese steamers and Chinese vessels of foreign build, and is admirably managed; the latter collects dues and duties from Chinese junks, and is administered by Chinese provincial officers, who, whatever the law may be, in too many cases, by "squeezes," collect as much as they can. Whether these "squeezes" amount on the whole to more or less than the dues and duties imposed on our commerce it is impossible to say. The opinions of our consuls and of other persons who have all the facilities open to any foreigner for judging, are divided. The trade of the junks is almost exclusively in native produce transported coastwise. Some ply between China and Singapore and Bangkok and Manila, and a good many beteen Hong-Kong and Chinese ports.

It has seemed to us that while with our old relations we could do very little to correct the abuses in the Chinese customs, we can lose nothing by agreeing to the article proposed, and the adoption of it brings two advantages:

First. It makes the imperial government directly responsible to us for any maladministration in the Chinese customs of which we may have reason to complain. Now we have practically no redress.

Secondly. A treaty stipulation like this tends to diminish the power of provincial officers and to increase that of the imperial authorities in the administration of the customs. Every movement in that direction is a gain for foreigners.

Having determined to accede to this request of the Chinese commissioners, we thought the opportunity a good one for asking additional articles on two subjects, both of interest and both of which had been very fully discussed with the representatives of all the treaty powers.

The first was the manner of judicial proceedings. The Chinese Government in the Chefoo convention had to some extent consented to what we asked, but that convention has never been ratified by Great Britain, and even if it had would only be of force as between China and Her Britannic Majesty.

After some discussion and some proposed amendments, the Chinese commissioners accepted the article as we had submitted, with only one inconsiderable modification. We had required that in all trials before the court of the defendant's nationality the official authority of the plaintiff's nationality should "have an honorable and convenient position in the court-house assigned him." The Chinese commissioners preferred that "he should be treated with the courtesy becoming his position." And as they had yielded what was much more important and had never yet been granted—that is, the right of the plaintiff's counsel to present, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, thus enabling him to render effective service in securing justice at the first trial of any case—we did not think it judicious to insist upon our own phraseology, especially as the position of a consular officer and the courtesy with which he is entitled to be treated are very well understood and protected by existing treaties.

We think this article an important and very useful concession, being, in our opinion, better in form and more efficient in its provisions than even the Chefoo convention.

The second subject upon which we desired to obtain a treaty stipulation was that of official communication. This subject had been long under discussion between the Chinese Government and the representatives of the treaty powers, and a memorandum had been addressed to the diplomatic body setting forth the regulations upon this subject which the Yamen were willing to adopt. We proposed to convert this memorandum into an article. We thought that if the Chinese Government were willing to adopt these regulations it would be advantageous both to it and the treaty powers, to put them in the shape of a treaty stipulation at once without delaying for the termination of the long discussions over lekin taxes and transit passes, which were waiting final settlement. Our colleagues of the diplomatic body would have very willingly consented to see us obtain such a stipulation, but we found the Chinese Government unwilling to separate this subject from the general negotiations with the treaty powers. As it was even uncertain whether the Government of China would finally make it an article of treaty stipulation at all, but it was almost certain that it would put it in the shape of an edict regulating the formalities of official intercourse, we did not deem it judicious to press the point.

Having thus agreed upon two articles, we submitted a third, which we wished to be made the introductory article of the second treaty. As originally proposed by us it was as follows :

ART. 1. The Emperor of China agrees to consider favorably the extension of such intercourse as may seem upon due examination to conduce to the best interest of both countries, and that he will receive with careful attention any representation of the Government of the United States as to such special extension of the area of trade intercourse as the United States may desire.

To this the Chinese commissioners objected. While it did not in explicit language bind them to anything, it might, in their opinion, be used as the basis of some claim for an unanticipated extension of commercial relations.

Our discussion was therefore confined to the articles indicated above. When they had been perfected the Chinese commissioners submitted a proposition which we had, from information received, been expecting, but of which they had so far given no sign. That was the prohibition of trade in opium to citizens of the United States.

We knew that the Chinese Government was very anxious to introduce such an article in any new treaties which they might make.

* * * * * * *

Since our arrival here we had had some opportunity of learning how thoroughly sincere the Chinese Government was in its desire to suppress this mischievous trade, and we believed that the government had in this effort the entire sympathy both of the government and people of the United States.

We therefore agreed to adopt the article if the Chinese commissioners would reconsider their refusal to accept Article I.

They said that they did not understand the words "trade area"; that any special extension of commercial privilege which they could understand would be considered, and that if we would make the article mutual, so that the governments might appear to be dealing on an equal footing, and substitute the words "extension of commercial relations" for the "extension of trade area," they would accept it.

As in neither case the article imposed any binding obligation of direct action, and as it did, in the form proposed, indicate the willingness of the Chinese Government to consider in a friendly and accommodating spirit the subject of the extension of our commercial relations, we thought it best to accept it.

The commission to Mr. Evarts.

No. 15.] UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 17, 1880. (Received January 5.)

SIR: In our two dispatches of the same date, we have informed you of the signature of the two treaties, copies of which were inclosed. We also informed you of the condition of the question as to the formal communication between consuls and the higher provincial Chinese authorities.

The only remaining subject of discussion between the two governments is that of lekin taxation, including the system of transit passes, and kindred regulations. As you are aware, this subject has been for some time under consideration by the diplomatic representatives of the treaty powers in Peking.

Since our arrival here, two conferences of the diplomatic body have been held. The result of those conferences, and communication with the Yamen is at present this: The diplomatic corps have, for many months, been engaged in an effort to secure amendments to the rules which the Chinese Government have instituted in respect to transit passes outwards. The foreign ministers have maintained that some of the rules are in contravention of treaties, and that all have been often enforced in a vexatious and unjust manner. A correspondence has been carried on with the Tsung-Li-Yamen which bids fair to produce desirable results at no distant day. But the correspondence is not yet concluded. The positions taken by the ministers, so far as we have been able to study them, meet with our entire approval.

The Chinese Government seem disposed to accept the rule that an import duty paid once for all at the port of entry, shall protect foreign importation from all other duties, to whatever extent, and in whatever direction, such importation may afterwards pass within the territory of China. But the subject is only under consideration, and there is a very serious difference between the Chinese Government and the treaty powers as to what the amount of such import duty should be.

At the conference held on the 15th instant, Sir Thomas Wade, Her Britannic Majesty's minister, to whom the subject had been referred, made a report, a copy of which will be found in inclosure No. 1. After hearing this report Monsieur Von Brandt, the German minister, was requested to prepare a memorandum, a copy of which is also inclosed. To this memorandum you will find the names of the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States appended, signifying their entire agreement with their colleagues.

You will observe that the question of the amount of import still remains under discussion, and that when—if that can be anticipated—the Chinese Government and the representatives of the treaty powers have agreed, then the whole scheme is to be referred back to each government for consideration and instruction. It is unnecessary to point out that this involves a negotiation of no short duration. All that we can now properly do, therefore, is to give whatever weight attaches to the opinion of our government, to the recommendation of the conference. We do not see that any useful purpose could be served by the full commission remaining in Peking during the progress of this discussion and the reference home of its result.

There can be no doubt of the great advantage to foreign trade that the settlement of this question upon the basis indicated would be, but the presence of the commission would not aid materially in its completion. We have therefore deemed it our duty to address a communication to Sir Thomas Wade, as "doyen of the diplomatic corps," stating that Mr. Angell was in full possession of the views of our government, and that, upon our departure, was fully authorized to deal with it in any stage of its progress as we would have been. The necessity of this arises from the fact that the commission in its full number was invited to participate in the conferences, and that the absence of two of its members seemed to require some explanation.

We can scarcely anticipate that any practical action in the matter can or will be taken until next spring, when it is possible that a reference may have been made to the respective treaty powers, and their instructions received.

Mr. Swift and Mr. Trescot will accordingly leave this capital for Shanghai on the 20th instant, going thence to Yokahama, whence Mr. Trescot will take the treaties by the first Pacific steamer that he can conveniently reach.

Memorandum on a conference held at the Tsung-li-Yamen on the 13th November, 1880, regarding exemption of foreign imports from taxation inland.

The origin of all discussions on this point, it will be borne in mind, is the difference of interpretation put by the Chinese authorities and the foreign merchant upon the clauses in the treaties affecting taxation of imports.

The construction most favorable to the foreign merchant has been that his imports, having paid import tariff duty, and a half duty, which it was at the option of the foreigner to pay or not, were thenceforward free of all possible charge, no matter to what part of the empire they might be carried. Some of the treaties, it is held, would scarcely justify so sweeping a claim to exemption, but by the favored-nation clause if so large a measure could be established under any one treaty, all foreign traders alike would of course be equally benefited.

The Chinese have argued that the half duty should clear inland duties leviable in transitu only from port to inland market, the treaties specifying none but the dues leviable at transit duty barriers. These barriers they have multiplied at pleasure, and they have taxed imports long before they could be said to have reached any barrier at all.

The continual altercation to which conflict of opinion on the point at issue has practically given occasion being scarcely less injurious to foreign interests than the unauthorized taxation itself has proved directly to trade it was proposed some time since to draw from the Tsung-li-Yamen the suggestion of some arrangement by which a single payment made in the first instance should clear imports of all further taxation whatever throughout the empire. This was, with a certain difference, the proposition of Sir Rutherford Alcock when negotiating a revision of the British treaty in 1868. The Chinese Government then consented, if the option to pay or not to pay the half duty were extinguished—if the payment of it, that is, were made as obligatory as the impost tariff duty itself—to free imports of all taxation in the maritime provinces. In the inner provinces certificate of the payment of the half duty was still to clear imports in transitu of barrier dues. On arrival at inland centers they were to become liable to taxation once they were separated from their certificate. The present proposal is to effect an arrangement for the clearance of imports by a single payment throughout the empire.

The ministers of the Yamen being called on to say under what conditions this might be secured promptly replied, by increase of taxation. Being pressed to state in what degree, they proposed a reference to the provinces; and this made, they signified their wish that the foreign representatives conferring with them should first declare their estimate. This was the point reached before the conference of the 13th instant. The ground on the foreign side taken on the 13th instant was the following:

The negotiators of the foreign treaties called in question had undoubtedly been of opinion that if the Chinese Government had secured to it the tariff duty, roughly estimated at five per cent. ad valorem, and the half duty—a total, that is, of seven and a half per cent. upon value—it ought to be content. This total it did not now receive. The customs returns of 1879 showed that the duties collected on imports, opium excluded, for the right of the Chinese to tax opium once purchased by Chinese is not contested was, taels 2,262,299. Had immediate payment of the half duty been obligatory there would have been further collected the sum of taels 1,131,149.

The sum collected on transit-passes, the application for these being optional, was but taels 342,795, or little more than one-third of this sum. The obligation to pay down the half duty would, therefore, manifestly be a concession very favorable to Chinese revenue. This was stoutly denied. The li-kin, the chief item of the abnormal taxation, imposition of which on his imports is protested against by the foreigner, amounted, it was affirmed, to a far larger sum than half the tariff duties. Could the Yamen, it was asked, produce statistics? There was some difficulty about a direct answer to this question; but, in the end, it was stated that according to the report of some provincial governments, the li-kin equaled twice, of others three times, the tariff duty. One reason earlier, given for the Yamen's unwillingness to name the amount to be added to the old tariff, had been its apprehension that the demand of the provinces would be far in excess of the expectations of foreign ministers; and the provincial estimates now referred to prove that the Yamen's surmise had been correct.

The natural rejoinder to these arguments was that the provincial estimate was far too high, and that the foreigners' experience authorized a conviction that whatever the amount really levied, but a limited proportion of it found its way into the public chest, central or provincial.

These conclusions were, of course, deprecated, and a suggestion being pressed for as to the utmost increase of tariff duty that foreign representatives might consent to move their governments to adopt, the ministers were assured that taking the tariff duty and the half duty at 7½ per cent., a rise of one-half per cent., or, at the most, of 1 per cent., would be regarded as a very liberal concession. An addition of a half per cent. would have given, in 1879, a total of taels 3,619,677; of 1 per cent., a total of taels 3,845,906.

The ministers were confident that this arrangement would not be satisfactory to the provincial governments, and, if not, would fail of its end. In some jurisdictions at this moment, the li-kin, as it had been stated, equaled three tariff payments; that is to say that, including the tariff, imports paid 20 per cent. In other jurisdictions they paid 15 per cent. Finally, after much discussion, they expressed a belief that 12½ per cent.—that is, a tariff and a half in addition to the present tariff duty—was the minimum that would satisfy the provinces.

T. WADE.

PEKING, November 15, 1880.

Draft of memorandum prepared by Monsieur de Brandt, as representing the opinion of himself and his colleagues, after hearing Sir Thomas Wade's report of his conference with the Tsung-li-Yamen on November 13, 1880.

The proposal that a single payment at the port of entry should be substituted for the optional payment of the transit duty, all transit dues, as well as the illegally levied inland and li-kin duties, seems admissible; less so the amount of this single payment as proposed by the Yamen.

By the payment of half the tariff duty the merchant can, under existing treaty stipulations, carry his imports free from any taxes, duties, or li-kin to any place in the interior named in the certificate.

The making the payment of the half tariff duty compulsory instead of optional should therefore free all imports from all further taxation, whatever it may be called or whatever its purpose, from the port of entry to any place in the interior to which they might be sent.

Admitting, for argument's sake, that the Chinese Government has the right to tax imports ad libitum on leaving this place in the interior, all that can, in justice, be claimed by them is that the loss which may arise from the suppression or abandonment of this right shall be made good to the Chinese Government. Imports forwarded from a first market to a second or third will, as long as the means of conveyance remain what they are, represent only a comparatively small percentage on the whole trade. The Chinese Government can therefore not expect more than a small compensation for the abolition of this right.

As Sir Thomas Wade has reminded his colleagues in the Anglo-Chinese convention of 1868, the Chinese Government agreed to free imports from all further taxation in the treaty port provinces in consideration of a compulsory payment of the half-tariff duty at the port of entry, reserving to itself the right to tax the imports ad libitum in other provinces.

If, therefore, fifty per cent. of the tariff duty was considered a fair equivalent for all taxes, dues, or li-kin legally or illegally levied on the large amount of imports within the treaty port provinces, twenty or at the utmost thirty per cent. of the tariff duty would be a fair compensation for the abandonment on the part of the Chinese Government of its right or pretension to levy taxes, duties, or li-kin on the much smaller amount of imports reaching the other provinces and distributed through them.

A proposal to this effect seems all that the representatives of the treaty powers could venture to submit to their governments, and all that these latter would be likely to consider.

The commissioners to Sir Thomas Wade.

UNITED STATES COMMISSION,
Peking, November 19, 1880.

SIR: As we have had the honor to receive at your hand, as the representative of the diplomatic corps in Peking, an invitation to join you in conference upon certain subjects of common interest to all the Treaty Powers, it becomes necessary to inform you that two members of the Commission Plenipotentiary sent hither by the Government of the United States, Messrs. Swift and Trescot, will leave this capital on the 20th, upon their return home.

Of several subjects commended our care, we have fortunately succeeded in making such treaty arrangements as we hope will be acceptable to our government. We would feel it our duty to remain and join in any negotiations with our colleagues upon such subjects as remain unsettled were it not that we feel ourselves authorized to believe, from what has passed in the conferences which we have attended, that at present no further result can be attained than a reference to their home governments of such propositions as they may agree upon, by the diplomatic representatives of the Treaty Powers. As we have already had the honor to signify our entire and cordial agreement with the views of the diplomatic body as to the recommendation to be submitted to the consideration of the Chinese Government, and, upon its consent, to be referred home for approval, we beg to inform you that any further discussion which may arise will be left to the charge of Mr. Angell, one of the commissioners, and who remains in Peking a Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary.

We have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.
JOHN L. SWIFT.

No. 49.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 20, 1880. (Received January 5, 1881.)

SIR: Sir Thomas Wade, Her Britannic Majesty's minister, has kindly shown me a dispatch which he has received from the British acting consul, James Scott, of Kiungchow and Hoihow, on the island of Hainan, giving information of the wreck of the American sailing ship James Bailey, 1,531 tons, of Portland, Me., commanded by Capt. Jos. W. Mann.

The vessel sailed from Hong-Kong, October 14, in ballast for Vancouver's Island; on the 17th she was driven by a storm on to the Wenchang coast of Hainan, half-way between Moufu and Tungku Hills. The officers and crew, twenty-two men in all, landed in safety. The natives speedily plundered the vessel, and attempted to prevent the men from going across the country to Hoihow. But all arrived at that port in due time, and immediately asked the assistance of the British acting consul. That officer took up their case with an earnestness and vigor which an American officer could not have surpassed. He not only took affidavits of their losses, but he at once communicated with the Taotai. The Taotai and the military commander of the district immediately dispatched a war vessel and soldiers to protect the wreck and arrest the guilty parties.

As the shipwrecked men must probably go to Hong-Kong, I am expecting to receive tidings from the consul at Hong-Kong, or the consul at Canton. Should the local authorities be dilatory in bringing the guilty to justice or in securing satisfaction for the injuries done, I trust I can rely on the Imperial Government for prompt and vigorous action, which I shall of course demand.

Meantime I have thought it due to Acting Consul Scott to send a note to him through the British minister, thanking him in behalf of our government, for his prompt and courteous and efficient action, and informing him that I should direct your attention to his conduct.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

No. 51.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 22, 1880. (Received January 17, 1881.)

SIR: There have been many interviews between the foreign office at Peking and the ministers of western powers on the forms of official intercourse. In this country where so much importance is attached to official etiquette and ceremony, this is a matter of consequence. It was taken up in the diplomatic conferences of last winter. A minute from the foreign office accompanying Mr. Seward's No. 692, of May 27, 1880, shows how the subject was left at that time.

On the 24th of September the Tsung-li Yamên submitted to Sir Thomas Wade, to whom the diplomatic body had specially assigned the management of this matter, another memorandum suggested by personal interviews with him. Sir Thomas Wade reported this to a diplomatic conference held on October 25. He was instructed by his colleagues to ask for some slight changes in the propositions of the Tsung-li Yamên, and at a conference held on November 15 he was able to report that the changes proposed had been assented to by the Yamên. This paper, as amended, is herewith inclosed. The changes proposed on October 25, and adopted by the Yamên, were the following:

At the beginning of the fourth paragraph the word "henceforward" was inserted. In the third line of the same paragraph the words "incumbent on" were substituted for "open to." The first line of the sixth paragraph originally read, "The treaties stipulate that consuls," &c.; whereas it now reads, "There is a difference between the treaties of the different powers. In some it is stipulated that consuls," &c.

By reference to the proceedings of the commission plenipotentiary it will be seen that an effort was made to secure in one of the treaties negotiated the insertion of an article binding the Chinese Government to the proposition they have assented to in this memorandum. Though that effort did not succeed, there is no reason to doubt that by proper official action the rules suggested will be promulgated and made binding on the provincial authorities. The completion of the business with the Tsung-li Yamên is still left to Sir Thomas Wade, who hopes to report final action at no distant day.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure in No. 51.]

Translation of memorandum on official intercourse, handed to Sir Thomas Wade by the ministers of the Yamên on the 24th September, as amended on November 13, 1880.

The Yamên have answered clause by clause the memorandum on the subject of forms of official intercourse received by them some time since.

As, however, the British minister did not appear to be fully satisfied with this reply, and repeatedly urged at personal interviews such consideration of the question as would satisfactorily dispose of it, the Yamên have now drawn up a farther set of propositions on the subject, which are as follows:

(1.) [It was proposed that] "whether at a port or in the interior, a consular officer having occasion to speak to the governor-general or governor of a province should be assured access to the high authority, and that when admitted into his Yamên he should be treated as a visitor, and not as the subordinate of the Chinese official." At this moment, in the provinces the governors-general, governors, Taotais, even though the rank (of the foreign official) be not the same as theirs, invariably treat (the foreign official) in interviews with the forms due to a visitor.

Henceforward, whenever (the foreign official) has business with them, it shall be equally incumbent on (the high authorities) to receive him, and whenever he is so received the forms observed shall be as between host and guest.

(2.) [It was proposed that] "in correspondence between consular officers and provincial high authorities a form should be used which does not suggest the existence of official subordination or the reverse between the persons engaged in the correspondence. The form Wen yi seemed to the foreign representatives to satisfy these conditions, and they would be glad to see it used instead of the forms now employed in all correspondence passing between consular officers and provincial authorities, without regard to their rank."

There is a difference between the treaties of different powers. In some it is stipulated that "consuls and acting consuls shall rank with intendants of circuits, and that vice-consuls, acting vice-consuls, and interpreters shall rank with prefects, and shall communicate with these officers, either personally or in writing, on a footing of equality." This stipulation is specially intended to indicate the conditions of relative rank, and it would not be expedient for officers in the positions of governors-general and governors to use the form Wen yi to consuls and other officers indiscriminately. As, however, the constitution is not in point of fact, seriously affected in this matter, some compromise should naturally be made, and it is now proposed that, while in ordinary official matters, consuls shall continue, as heretofore, to address the Taotai in the chao-hui form, and the latter shall, on behalf of the consul "report" (chuan shen) to the governor-general or governor, who will continue to "instruct" (cha huing) the Tao-tai, direct correspondence, between (the higher official and the consul), being thereby diminished,—on all matters of importance, the form of correspondence shall, without reference to the rank of the parties, be the chas hui or communication.

(3.) [It was proposed that] "in official correspondence the consul should be addressed as 'Kuei-ling-shih,' and when he is referred to that the name of the consul should be prefixed." Also that "as the circles and marks drawn on instructions from a higher official to a lower indicate that they are in the nature of a command they should not be used in addressing a foreign official."

As there is no constitutional objection to either of these propositions, both may be acted upon. The order of proceeding in the above propositions is agreed to by way of compromise, the motive whereof is a sincere desire to consolidate and improve friendly relations.

The ministers can only hope that the British minister will carefully consider them, with his colleagues.

No. 52.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 22, 1880. (Received January 17, 1881.)

SIR: Among the subjects which have long engaged the attention of the diplomatic body at Peking is that of "transit trade outwards." It was considered at the conferences which were held here last spring.

My predecessor inclosed with his No. 673 of May 1, 1880, a memorandum and a draft of rules submitted to the diplomatic corps by Mr. von Brandt, the German minister. The rules, after some revision, were placed before the Tsung-li Yamen for consideration.

On the 27th of September the Yamen sent to Mr. von Brandt a paper setting forth certain alterations which they suggested in the provisional rules recommended by the diplomatic corps. A copy of this paper is herewith inclosed.

Mr. von Brandt submitted this communication of the Yamen, with a memorandum upon it, to the ministers at a conference held here on October 25. In the discussion which followed most of the positions taken up by Mr. von Brandt in his memorandum were approved, but some changes were made in certain amendments which he proposed to make in the rules. I have thought I could best describe the details of the action of the conference by annotations on the margin of the memorandum, which is inclosed.

On the 19th instant the Yamen, in an interview with Mr. von Brandt, announced that the opposition of the provincial authorities to Rule II and Rule III, 1 and 2, was so strong that they could not see their way clear to assent to them. But they asked him to give them in writing his reasons for urging those rules.

At a conference held on the 22d instant Mr. von Brandt read to the diplomatic body a draft of the reasons which he proposed to send to the foreign office for desiring the two rules as well as the others.

The ministers, without formally adopting the whole paper, authorized him to close with the statement that his colleagues could not comprehend why Rules II and III should be unacceptable to them. Mr. von Brandt stated to his colleagues that, in the interview with the foreign office he received the impression that they were not willing to agree finally to the rules, but that they wished to be provided with reasons to press upon the reluctant provincial officers. He will present his communication to them at an early day.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure No. 1 in No. 52.]

Alterations proposed by the Tsung-li Yamen in the provincial rules.

I.

RULE I. These rules come into force on the —— day, —— moon of the sixth year, Kuang-Hsü. All outward transit passes issued before this time shall, after the expiration of one year, if the merchant has not, (within that time), reported for examination to the customs authorities, by whom the passes were issued, the native produce stated in the pass as to be bought and the corresponding transit certificate be forthwith canceled by the superintendent of customs and the corresponding transit certificates be recalled; and all goods which the holders of such canceled passes may attempt to bring down under them will be confiscated. All transit passes issued subsequently to the —— day, —— moon of the sixth year of Kuang-Hsü, i. e., the time when these rules come into force, and not used within one year from the date of issue, will be canceled at the expiration of such year.

Rule 2. [Addition to.] No further passes will be issued to a merchant whose passes had to be canceled, their time having expired, and who acts in opposition to this rule and does not surrender his pass.

Rule 3. [Addition to.] In all cases in which goods are to be confiscated, and there are no goods which might be surrendered, the value of the goods stated in the pass is to be paid by the merchant for confiscation.

Rule 5. [The following sentence is omitted:] Except goods for the northern ports for which the customs authorities will grant the necessary extension of time.

Rule 8. [Addition to.] At the time when transferring such goods the merchant shall report the nationality and the name of the merchant to whom the goods are transferred to the consul, by whom they will be communicated to the superintendent of customs, to be placed on record in order that the merchant may not throw off any responsibility afterwards.

Rule 9 is omitted.

II.

With regard to the proposed rule for duty-free native produce, we find that such are not mentioned in the treaties, and have therefore expunged this rule.

III.

Rule 2. Native produce, bought in the interior or at the port, has, before goods are manufactured from it, to be first reported to the customs authorities for examination. When exported, such manufactured goods shall pay the export duty according to their present form. If carried coastwise, they will be treated like native goods.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 52.]

Memorandum on alterations proposed by the Tsung-li Yamên or Mr. Von Brandt on the provisional rules for transit passes outward.

[The notes on the margin describe the action taken by the foreign ministers at the conference held October 25, 1880.]

Rule I, 1.

Mr. von Brandt's suggestion approved, and Rule I, 1, as altered, accepted.

There seems to be no objection to the alteration of Rule I, 1, as proposed by the Yamên, the rule being in fact little more than a paraphrase of the one originally proposed by the foreign representatives.

Rule I, 2.

The addition to Rule I, 2, approved.

The addition to Rule I, 2, proposed by the Yamên, does also seem acceptable; it has been indeed already accepted by the German Empire for transit passes inwards in § 7, of the supplementary rules to the additional convention of March 31, 1880; a similar rule being contained in Rule IV of the supplementary rules to the British supplementary convention of October 24, 1869.

Rule I, 3.

The addition to Rule I, 3, accepted.

There seems to be no objection against the principle announced in the addition to Rule I, 3, proposed by the Yamên, that in the absence of goods subject to confiscation, their value as given in the transit certificate should be paid as a fine by the merchant guilty of a transgression of the rules.

Rule I, 5.

The proposal of the Yamên to expunge from the rules the exception in favor of goods for the northern ports seems unacceptable in view of the fact that it may be impossible to transship the goods within the time specified. The rule ought therefore to be maintained or rather extended, so as to give power to the customs on application to grant an extension of the time for reshipment in every case where it is proved to their satisfaction that shipment within the prescribed time will be impossible.

The Yamên's proposal rejected and Mr. von Brandt's exception insisted upon.

Rule I, 8.

There seems to be no objection to the proposal of the Yamên that the name of the merchant, to whom the goods are transferred, should be communicated to the consul and through him to the superintendent of customs.

The Yamên's proposal accepted, but the phraseology to be made clearer.

Rule I, 9.

The proposal of the Yamên to omit Rule I, 9, is unacceptable; the joint jurisdiction in all cases of fines or confiscation being the necessary corollary to the concessions made by the foreign representatives in the proposed regulations. There seems further to be no reasonable ground why the procedure agreed upon in 1868, and accepted by the Chinese Government as well as the governments of the treaty powers, with regard to confiscations and fines, which was inserted also in the British supplementary convention of 1869, Article IX, should not be put in force also with regard to the rules now under consideration.

The Yamên's proposal rejected. Joint jurisdiction to be insisted on.

Rule II.

The assertion of the Yamên that no duty-free native produce exists, has no foundation, whatever, as can be seen by the British treaty of 1858 rules, Rule II, where it is expressly stated that the above-mentioned articles pay no import or export duty. The rule expunged by the Yamên will therefore have to be reinserted.

The rule expunged must remain.

Rule III, 2.

The alteration proposed by the Yamên seems neither practical nor practicable and ought to be rejected.

In addition to the alterations proposed by the Yamên some other alterations and additions might be introduced with advantage into the proposed rules, the acceptance of some of the proposals made by the Yamên giving sufficient cause to the foreign negotiator to make some new proposals also on his part.

The Yamên's alteration rejected.

Rule I, 4.

Add to: At the arrival of the produce at the barrier nearest the port or where there is no further barrier between the one at which the transit certificate was issued and the port at the custom-house.*

This addition seems desirable, especially with reference to Hoichow and Pakhoi, in order to avoid the necessity of produce bought at the mainland having to pass through Hainan.

As a further addition to this rule the following might be proposed:

In case of alleged damage or deterioration of goods en route, the customs on the application of the merchant will inspect the goods, and if the damage, etc., be proved, grant a proportionate diminution of the transit dues.

The same object might, perhaps, be obtained by inserting in Rule I, 7, after "while at the ports," "or en route" and after, "a reduction in the amount of export duty" "or transit dues."

The proposed addition approved.

This form of amendment rejected.

The Chinese translation of Rules II and III, 1 and 2, having seemed, on further consideration, to be liable to misconstruction on the part of the Chinese authorities it is proposed to adopt in their place the annexed Chinese version of which the following is the exact English translation:

*Insert after the word "barrier" the words, "on the shortest and most direct line."

RULE II.

The passage in brackets amended thus: "When relanded it is exempt, according to rule, from tariff import duty, but has to pay a coast trade duty."

Whenever any native produce declared to be exempt from tariff import and export duties by Rule 2, is shipped, it is to be shipped accordingly exempt from tariff export duty; [but when relanded it is to pay a coast trade duty while exempt according to rule from tariff import duty.] As for this coast trade duty, its amount is declared to be 2½ per cent. ad valorem.

RULE III, 1.

This to be substituted for the original.

Native merchandise bought at the port is to pay tariff export duty when shipped, but is not to be called on to pay any other duty or tax, whatsoever. With the sole exception of native merchandise, brought from the interior under treaty transit passes, all native merchandise to be shipped is to be considered as bought at a port and treated accordingly.

RULE III, 2.

Strike out the first word "native."

Native goods manufactured at a port from native produce, whether arrived there under transit passes from the interior or procured otherwise, pay tariff export duty on shipment, but are not called on to pay any other duty or tax whatsoever.

UNITED STATES COMMISSION TO CHINA,
Shanghai, November 29, 1880.

SIR: By the last dispatches and telegrams from the commission, you were informed that two treaties had been signed, and that Messrs. Swift and Trescot would leave for Shanghai on the 20th, and that Mr. Trescot would bring over the treaties by the first Pacific steamer that he could reach from this point.

We left Peking on the 20th and reached Shanghai on the 27th. The steamer connecting with the Pacific line at Yokohama leaving on the 30th, Mr. Trescot will go in her to take the City of Peking at that port on the 8th December.

No. 58.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 30, 1880. (Received January 17, 1881.)

SIR: Mr. Seward, in his No. 665, of April 22, 1880, informed the Department that among the subjects taken up at that time by the diplomatic body here for joint consideration was that of inland taxation of goods imported into China. Sir Thomas Wade, Her Britannic Majesty's minister, was charged with the presentation of the subject to the Tsung-li Yamên.

At the meeting of the diplomatic body held October 28, Sir Thomas made a verbal report of his interviews with the Yamên in the matter. He announced that he had been brought to the conclusion that the foreign office would be willing to assent to the imposition of a fixed duty higher than the present tariff prescribes, on the payment of which the goods imported could be exempted from all further taxes of every kind, no matter into what part of the empire they might be carried. The ministers present expressed themselves as disposed to recommend to their respective governments the adoption of such a plan, provided the import duty was fixed at a reasonable rate.

At the conference of November 15, Sir Thomas Wade presented a written report, which will be found appended as an inclosure to the dispatch No. 15 of the commission plenipotentiary.

It will be seen that Sir Thomas had taken as the basis of his argument with the foreign office the fact that in 1868, in negotiating with Sir Rutherford Alcock, they had consented to accept the payment of an import duty of 7½ per cent. in lieu of the import duty of 5 per cent. and all inland taxation in the treaty-port provinces. When called on to name a rate which would now be satisfactory, they mention 12½ per cent. Sir Thomas, however, received the impression that they would be willing ultimately to fix a rate intermediate between 7½ and 12½. The views of the ministers and of the commissioners plenipotentiary are expressed in a memorandum on Sir Thomas Wade's report drawn by Mr. Von Brandt, the German minister. A copy of this memorandum is also inclosed with No. 15 of the commission to the Department.

Sir Thomas Wade is still continuing discussions of the subject with the foreign office.

SIR: I inçlose herewith replies which I have received from our consuls at Ning-po and Canton to my circular making inquiries about tonnage dues, and duties on imports and exports.

You will observe in them the same difference of testimony as you have seen in the consular replies previously forwarded. They agree that no discrimination is made in respect to vessels which report to the foreign customs. In respect to the native craft—the junks—Consul Lord, while affirming that no one can know what is the practice, yet doubts whether any discriminations exist. Consul Lincoln, on the contrary, reports that it is generally believed by foreigners that at Canton the tonnage dues on native craft and the duties on native goods imported in them, are at least 30 per cent. less than on foreign vessels and their cargoes.

These statements go to confirm the theory I have previously advanced that the usage differs in respect to junks at different ports. How far our government, which excludes altogether all foreign vessels from engaging in our coasting trade, may deem it necessary to take this into consideration, it is not for me to suggest.

No. 137.] NOVEMBER 6, 1880.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your dispatch No. 6, in which answers are requested to certain questions relating to the taxes levied in China on American commerce compared with those levied on the commerce of her own people or the people of other countries.

In reply I will here quote your questions and answer them seriatim.

First. "Are any other or higher tonnage dues exacted in the open ports of China from the vessels of the United States resorting thereto than are paid by Chinese vessels or any foreign vessels engaged in like trade therewith?"

So far as concerns vessels that are required to report to the general customs—the customs under foreign inspection, (and this includes all vessels under foreign flags, and all Chinese vessels that are registered), there is but one rule—they all pay the same tonnage dues. There are, however, a good many native vessels that are not registered; or they are not so registered as to be required to report to the imperial customs. They report to the local customs only. And what, if any, tonnage dues they pay we have no means of ascertaining. But they are engaged only in the coast trade and fisheries and rarely if ever carry foreign goods. The presumption is that the charges to which they are subjected are not larger than they would be if they were registered, as in that case they would apply for registers; and that they are not much smaller, as some do apply for registers.

Second. "Are any other or higher customs duties of import exacted in China from American citizens importing merchandise thither than are paid by Chinese subjects or the citizens of the most favored power, importing the like merchandise into China?"

No. So far as duties are collected by the imperial customs there is but one law and one practice. The tariff rules and shows no favor or disfavor to nationalities. And what is true of imports is true of exports.

Third. "Is there any discriminating or additional customs duty imposed upon merchandise, whether of American or foreign origin, entering the open ports of China in vessels of the United States, which is not imposed upon the like goods entering these ports in Chinese vessels or in vessels of any foreign power?"

No. Vessels, persons, and goods in China are both, in law and practice, treated equally. No favors or disfavors are shown to any one or to anything. Nor do I see how any discriminations could arise under the favored-nation clause, found, I believe, in all the treaties, so far as foreign nationalities are concerned. China might make discriminations in favor of her own vessels, her own goods, and her own people; but as yet she has not done it. Of course, I speak as before intimated, only so far as relates to the imperial customs. What may be the practice in the local customs, which still have control over a large portion of the old junk trade, no one can know. But so far as this port is concerned, I doubt whether any discriminations exist.

Mr. Lincoln to Mr. Angell.

No. 65.] NOVEMBER 2, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 4, of the 22d ultimo.

In reply I have to say that during my administration of this office I have never known of an instance at this port wherein higher tonnage dues have been exacted from merchant vessels of the United States than are prescribed by the treaty of 1858 (article 16), or than are paid by merchant vessels of other foreign countries. The same remark applies to duties on imports and exports in foreign craft.

I cannot state positively whether the tonnage dues exacted from native merchant sailing-vessels are the same or not, as it is impossible to obtain reliable information from the authorities at the native custom-house, where all such craft enter and pay dues and duties. It is, however, firmly believed by foreigners that the tonnage dues on native craft and duties on goods imported in them are at least 30 per cent. less than on foreign vessels and their cargoes. This remark does not, however, apply to the Chinese Merchants' Steam Navigation Company's steamers as they enter and pay dues and duties at the foreign customs.

I regret that I do not clearly comprehend your meaning as to "what answer to these inquiries will describe not only the law, but also the practice of the authorities, &c." The foregoing, I think, is as descriptive of the practice at this port as I am at present able to give.

No. 141.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

No. 60.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 30, 1880. (Received January 17, 1881.)

SIR: On receiving your instruction No. 27 of August 16, 1880, calling attention to certain allegations found in a circular issued by Mr. Francis Parry, of England, of inhuman proceedings in the mixed court of Shanghai, for which he intimated the foreign consuls are in some degree responsible, I at once called the attention of Consul-General Denny to the matter.

I have received a reply from him, a copy of which I inclose. It is so full that I need say but little on the subject.

Mr. Parry has probably given the impression that the foreign consuls have a larger responsibility for the procedure in the mixed court than that which they can really exercise. The court is a purely Chinese court, which administers Chinese law.

Neither the consuls nor their representatives, the assessors, can perform any other function in the court than to be present and watch the proceedings and question witnesses in order to see that justice is done to the citizens of the nation they represent, or to protest if injustice is done to such citizens. In all cases between Chinese and foreigners the case is tried in the courts of the defendant's nationality, the proper official representing the plaintiff's nationality being permitted to be present to watch the proceedings in the interest of the plaintiff, but having no direct voice in the judgment.

It has been thought, and I believe justly, that the frequent presence of foreign assessors in the mixed court of Shanghai has done much to ameliorate its procedure, and that in respect to humanity it presents a most favorable contrast to most Chinese courts.

Unhappily the penal code of China does sanction the torture of witnesses and corporal punishments, which seem to us barbarous. And we cannot indulge very sanguine hopes that the most vigorous representations foreigners can make of their repugnance to such usages will speedily work a radical change.

But our consul-general has instructed our assessor to protest against the use of the cangue and of the bamboo in cases in which he appears. It is true that in the past, punishments in excess of the hundred blows allowed by law have been inflicted; but none such have been administered since Mr. Denny has been at Shanghai. It is perhaps justifiable to infer that an improvement in this respect has taken place. It is to be observed, also, that the magistrate of the court asserts that owing to the objections of foreigners to the use of the bamboo it is now usually resorted to when the assessors are not in attendance, and in the opinion of the consul-general it is now rarely employed by the mixed court magistrate.

It would seem that there is some error in respect to the report of the case which is described as a particularly shocking one of torturing a prisoner in the presence of a United States assessor, the case of Shun-chi sze, charged with abduction. The consul-general reports that there is no such case on the official records.

I think then that, so far is it from being true, that the foreign consuls and particularly that the American consul-general and assessor are implicated by acts of commission or of omission in countenancing or tolerating inhuman punishments ordered by the mixed court of Shanghai; the fact really is that by their efforts and by the presence of the assessors in that court, the procedure in it has been ameliorated and improved as it has been in no other purely Chinese court in the Empire.

No. 12.] OCTOBER 12, 1880.

SIR: A Mr. Francis Parry has issued, in London, a circular, dated July, 1880, concerning alleged inhuman proceedings in the mixed court at Shanghai. The State Department has directed my attention to the subject, and informed me that the circular has called out a considerable amount of unfavorable comment from the English press upon the action of the mixed court. If I rightly understand Mr. Parry, he aims to convey the idea more or less clearly that inhuman practices are sanctioned by the foreign assessors who sit with the Chinese magistrate, and that at any rate the foreign consuls or ministers might do more than they have done to mitigate the punishments or improve the penal code of China.

I quote the important part of his circular:

* * * "As to the sentences of the court; those in excess of 100 blows are, according to the Chinese code, illegal, the punishment of the cangue or huge wooden collar is a torture; beating on the face is a mutilation; the most severe is the remission of persons convicted of capital and heinous crimes to be judged, tortured during examination, and imprisoned by the higher court of the district magistrate in the native city. This remission is not the ordinary "extradition" provided for in the treaty of Tientsin, Article XXI; the criminal is not demanded by the city authorities, the rendition is a matter of convenience.

"These matters demand rectification. The association of the foreign consul with the Chinese mandarin is a point of contact capable of being made the inlet for that regard for humanity common to civilization, the base of all the humanities.

"Japan has abolished judicial torture. Turkey no longer legalizes the mutilation of offenders. China has yet to gain a good name by repressing the cruelty which is the marked characteristic of her judicial system." * * *

Of course it is well understood here that the mixed court is a Chinese court, administering Chinese law, and also that any attempts to reform the penal code of China can be rewarded with only slow progress. But all the consular and diplomatic representatives of western nations certainly desire to do what they may to improve the judicial proceedings, especially in a court in which foreign assessors sit, and to set forth the facts to their own governments with such distinctness as to relieve themselves from the suspicion of encouraging inhumanity, or even of tolerating it when they can prevent it.

As the mixed court at Shanghai necessarily falls under your personal observation, I think it my duty to invite from you any statements or suggestions, which the above extract from Mr. Parry's circular may prompt you to make. I would especially ask you—

1st. Whether punishment in excess of 100 blows is, according to the Chinese code, illegal. Mr. Parry names eleven cases in which, during 1879—the United States assessor sitting—more than 100 blows were given.

2nd. Is beating to extort confession ordered by the court. Mr. Parry cites a case, March 20, Dr. Macgowan, assessor, in which it is stated that 50 blows were given for this purpose, and that these failing of the result, 50 more. It is called the Shun-che sze abduction case.

No. 35.] NOVEMBER 11, 1880.

SIR: Complying with the request contained in your No. 12, relating to a circular issued by one Francis Parry, calling attention to certain alleged inhuman proceedings in the so-called mixed court at Shanghai, I beg to submit the following comments:

I may say in the beginning that, perhaps, there is no institution in China which foreigners are supposed to know of whose organization, powers, and duties are so little understood as the so-called "mixed court" here. It, perhaps, takes its name from this fact, for certainly it is not "mixed" in any other sense.

It was organized in 1864 by local officials, and approved of by the Tsung-li Yamên, who issued a limited, and imperfect set of rules for it in 1869.

This court is presided over by a Chinese judge, who administers Chinese law according to the rules and precedents which have governed in Chinese courts for centuries past, the only difference between it and other native courts being a court designated by the Chinese authorities in which may be tried suits between natives residing within the foreign settlement and where the wrongs committed by Chinese against the rights of foreigners, either of person or property, may be redressed without their consuls being compelled to go to the taotai, and then the case referred by him to the district magistrate—that is to say, a kind of deputy court of the district magistrate.

As it would neither be advisable nor practical for the consuls to attend in person such a court, it has been so arranged that interpreters of the different consulates may appear for the consuls, to sit with the native judge to watch the proceedings in the character of assessors, but who in reality are not assessors at all, as they cannot interfere in the least with the proceedings or judgments of the court, even when their own nationals are concerned. For this reason I have instructed the interpreter of this consulate to appear in the so-called "mixed court" only when citizens of the United States are in some way interested in its judicial business, and this for the purpose of watching and reporting the proceedings to me; when, in my opinion, justice is not done, I shall continue, as heretofore, to apply to the customs taotai (superintendent of trade) to correct the injustice.

The treaties provide that cases arising between subjects of China and citizens of the United States shall be tried in the court of the defendant, and the one in question has been established by the Chinese authorities for convenience sake, for the trial of suits when the defendant is a Chinese subject, just as the United States consular courts have been designated for the trial of cases when the defendant is a citizen of the United States, and one is just as much a mixed court as the other; one administers the laws of China, the other those of the United States, and, under the treaties, Chinese officials have the same right to appear and take part in the proceedings in our consular courts, when the rights of their people are involved, as our officials have to appear in a Chinese court and take part when the rights of our citizens are concerned.

The use of the bamboo and cangué as means of punishment is certainly objectionable in the extreme, even revolting to Western ideas in the administration of justice. But so long as it remains a part of the penal code of China and continues to be enforced by the Chinese authorities as the most popular punishment inflicted upon offenders in minor cases, it is useless for foreigners to enter their protests before petty officials.

There is not an assessor perhaps who visits the so-called "mixed court" who would not abolish the use of the bamboo and cangue if he could. But as the assessors have no power in this direction, the only thing they can do is to protest against such practices, which has been done repeatedly, a course I have instructed the interpreter of this consulate to invariably pursue when it is necessary for him to appear in cases when such punishments are ordered.

The magistrate of the court in question informs me that as foreigners object to the use of the bamboo, such punishments are usually inflicted in the afternoon when assessors are not in attendance, and that never, except in one case, has a witness been tortured in the presence of a foreign assessor. He also informs me that no such case as "the Shun-che sze abduction case" ever occurred in the "mixed court" wherein torture for confession was resorted to as alleged by Mr. Parry. In addition to this, I have examined the records of this consulate, wherein is recorded the title, history in brief, and judgment of every case tried in the so-called "mixed court" when the United States assessor has appeared, and I can find no such case as the one referred to, neither have I been able to discover from this record that torture for confession has ever been resorted to. This fact should exonerate the assessor from complicity in such punishments. There are, however, many judgments recorded wherein bambooing and the cangue were ordered as punishments, and some of these exceed one hundred blows, the number authorized by the penal code. The record, however, does not show that any such excessive punishment has been given since I assumed charge of this consulate-general.

If Mr. Parry desires to make his pamphlet eminently sensational by recounting the cruel and unhuman treatment imposed by Chinese officials upon their criminal classes, he should have resorted to the records of other native courts and to the almost daily reports contained in the native press, rather than to the record of the so-called mixed court, as instance the following case tried before the Shanghai magistrate of the native city a few days ago, and reported in one of the native newspapers:

"A Chinaman charged a fellow countryman with having stolen some musical instruments at the wedding of one of his relatives. It appeared that another relative of the complainant, a Taoist priest, employed some of his colleagues to play at the marriage feast, whereupon a musician of the district, together with others, stole their musical instruments.

The accused admitted the charge and stated that the complainant had violated the rules and customs prevailing among the Chinese, that none other than musicians of the ward or district in which the wedding took place should have been employed, and that the complainant had interfered with his business in allowing the priest and his colleagues to perform the musical part of the ceremony at the wedding. The magistrate summoned the tepao (head man) of the ward in which the wedding took place, and after asking him some questions, ordered him to be bambooed 800 blows. The punishment was inflicted on account of his not attending to his business properly. A Yamên runner was also punished with 600 blows for dereliction of duty, while the magistrate ordered the complainant to be bambooed 50 times for bringing the case into court, and the accused to receive 400 blows."

In answering your questions specifically, I have to say:

1st. The punishment in excess of 100 blows is, according to the Chinese code, illegal.

2d. Beating to extort confession has been resorted to under the order of the court in the past, and the barbarous practice will no doubt be continued in the future, but, as before stated, this beating takes place at the session of the court held in the afternoon, when assessors are not present, but even then, I may add that my investigations show that such punishments are rarely inflicted by the mixed court magistrate.

No. 65.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, December 3, 1880. (Received January 31, 1881.)

SIR: After the departure of the two commissioners, my colleagues, I received from Mr. William N. Pethick, of Tien-tsin, a letter which contains some interesting statements addressed to the commission. I have thought it well to forward you a copy.

Mr. Pethick's views are of interest, not only because of his intelligence and his long residence in China, during a portion of which he has held official positions under our government, but especially because of his close and confidential, perhaps we may say official or semi-official, relations with Li-Hung Chang, the grand secretary and viceroy of this province. It is by no means a violent presumption that Mr. Pethick's letter reflects the views of the viceroy, and so gains a value which makes it worthy of transmission to you.

Moreover, the figures which he gives in elucidation of the disastrous influence of the opium trade in China, in a purely commercial point of view, are very impressive. When we see that China pays more for opium annually than she receives for her whole exportation of silk, or than she receives for her whole crop of tea, we can understand why intelligent Chinese statesman, like the viceroy of this province, regarding the importation only as a business transaction, deeply regret it.

But no figures can give even an approximate idea of the ruinous effects upon the health and the demoralizing effects upon the character which are produced by the rapidly increasing use of opium in this empire. One must live here and see the wretched condition of the victims of the drug to appreciate what a curse it is to this nation. It is a matter of congratulation that so few of our citizens suffer themselves to be engaged at all in its importation or sale.

In this connection I beg leave to refer you to Mr. Low's dispatch No. 46, of January 10, 1871, which contains some very interesting statistics and comments on the subject.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure in No. 65.]

Mr. Pethick to the United States special commissioners to China.

TIEN-TSIN, CHINA, November 22, 1880.

YOUR EXCELLENCIES: I cannot deny myself the liberty of writing to offer my congratulations upon your success at Peking. A long official career in China and my present relations with the grand secretary and viceroy Li, enable me to say with confidence that the success which has crowned your efforts will have a marked effect upon the welfare of humanity and civilization, at least in this part of the world.

The question of Chinese immigration to the United States has been settled in a way that will give satisfaction to both countries. But though the solution of that vexed question was the end and aim of your mission, I leave what has been accomplished to speak for and commend itself to our people, as its bearings will be so well understood by them. My present concern is with opium, a subject not quite so well understood at home as the other.

It is a mistake to say that since the opium war with England in 1842, the Chinese Government has never shown a genuine desire to limit or suppress the opium traffic. The printed laws of the empire, imperial edicts, memorials from the members of the government at Peking and from the provincial authorities, and remarks by the ministers of the Chinese foreign office, addressed to the representatives of foreign governments in documents and in conversation, fully attest the fact that China has never consented to bear, without murmur, this great wrong which was forced upon her. Nor because imperial edicts are set at naught, and the cultivation of the poppy connived at by officials in some parts of the country, is it fair to tax the government with indifference to the spread of this evil. Blood and treasure were spent freely in combating its introduction, and, though defeated in war, the government has not remained a silent or unfeeling witness of this blight extending over the country. The public archives down to the present time bear witness to the fact. American merchants formerly shared in this traffic, and American ships are ready even now to carry opium from place to place in China. But the trade has fallen largely into the hands of Jews and Parsees, British subjects, from India. Very few English mercantile firms of reputation are concerned with it, save by employing their vessels to carry it about. Yet the Chinese people make no such nice distinction as to principals and accessories in this trade. They know that opium was forced on the country by a war, that all foreign merchants and their ships have engaged in the trade, and that any foreign vessel will carry opium now. The common name with them for opium is "yang yao" (foreign drug), and the simple facts ever present in their minds are that foreigners first brought opium into the country and bring it still; and the efforts of their authorities to put it down have no manner of effect upon foreigners. Thus Americans, as foreigners in this country, and being free to deal in opium, come in for their share of the opprobium equally with English merchants, and bring the fair fame of Western civilization into disrepute.

To give a clear idea of the present extent of the foreign opium trade in China, I will here quote some statistics, taken from the latest official report of the foreign customs service of the Chinese Government; Chinese weights and values are reduced, for convenience, into our own weights and currency.

Imports into China from foreign countries during the year 1879.

	Value.
1. Opium (from India, under monopoly of the British Government, 11,073,333 pounds)	$50,700,000
2. Cotton goods (from England and the United States)	31,400,000
3. Woolen goods (chiefly from England)	7,000,000
4. Metals (chiefly from England)	5,700,000
5. Matches (chiefly from Europe)	550,000
6. Kerosene oil (from the United States)	1,000,000
7. Sundries (from all countries)	18,000,000
Total value of all imports	$114,350,000

Exports from China to foreign countries during the year 1879.

	Value.
1. Tea, 265,000,000 pounds	$46,000,000
2. Silk	40,000,000
3. Sugar	3,000,000
4. Sundries	11,200,000
Total value of exports	$100,200,000

Value of whole foreign trade, export and import, for the year 1879..... $215,000,000

The total quantity of foreign opium imported during the year 1879 reached a figure never attained before, namely, 83,050 piculs (11,073,333 pounds, over 5,000 tons), representing a value of 36,536,617 taels, or about $51,000,000, and this formed very nearly one-half of the whole foreign import trade. The amount imported has steadily and rapidly increased from 52,000 peculs in 1864 to 82,000 in 1879. In 1879 the import was 11,000 piculs (one picul, 133⅓ pounds) more than the previous year.

This will show that the use of foreign opium is steadily and rapidly increasing in China. To this is to be added the amount consumed in Hong-Kong, and the amount re-exported thence for the use of the Chinese in California, Australia, and elsewhere; and estimating 21,919 piculs as smuggled from Hong-Kong into China, the customs authorities state that "the total importation of opium into China would therefore appear to have amounted in 1879 to 104,970 piculs," (13,995,000 pounds over 6,000 tons).

This single article (opium) equals in value all the other goods brought to China from foreign countries. Its value is greater than all the tea sent out of China, or all the silk. For the 265,000,000 pounds of tea China sends abroad, she is given 11,000,000 pounds of opium, and still has $5,000,000 to pay for this opium in other goods, the opium being worth nearly $51,000,000 and the tea but $46,000,000.

These figures establish quite enough for my purpose, which is to show that the black stream of pollution which has so long flown out of India into China has been increasing in volume and spreading its baneful influence wider and wider. If this stream be not checked, the world may soon despise China as a nation of opium-smokers, even as Judah was reviled by the prophet for her abominations.

I take it for granted that the ill-effects, physical and moral, of opium-smoking are known and admitted by intelligent and unprejudiced people, and notwithstanding the fine-spun theories of various apologists for the habit, it is enough here to refer to the positive condemnatory testimony of native victims of the habit; to all intelligent and respectable Chinese; to foreigners who have had much experience in the country, and to the united opinion of the foreign medical faculty in China from the earliest date of foreign intercourse to the present. The British Government long ago abandoned its defense of the trade on moral grounds, and now sustain it simply and confessedly for financial reasons.

Your excellencies have appeared in China at this juncture, and while seeking to remedy a misfortune suffered by our country at the hands of the Chinese, you have been mindful to redress a wrong long sustained by China from the United States, for we have been more or less involved in the opium trade in common with other foreign countries. This is an act of common justice and national equity. It fulfills a moral obligation which has rested upon our country to make amends for the wrong which has so long had our tacit and implied approval. The United States by a bold and noble declaration a ainst opium now stand in the right before the world and the God of nations.

It would be premature to forecast the good results which should follow this act. You are aware of the profound effect it has had upon the government at Peking and upon the Viceroy Li. That effect, I feel certain, is not transitory. It has encouraged long deferred hope; confirmed oft-defeated determination; it has nerved the arm of the government with new strength, and we shall see China once again grappling with the monster that is stealing away the prosperity and energies of her people.

I feel proud to belong to a country capable of such an act of magnanimity to a weaker one. It is an act of peace and good-will such as exalts a nation, if we believe Holy Writ, far more than the conquests and triumphs of war; and your excellencies will doubtless come to reflect upon your work, so happily accomplished, with the pleasing consciousness of a great duty performed before God and man in behalf of our country.

I have the honor to be your excellencies' obedient servant,

WM. N. PETHICK.

No. 75.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, December 20, 1880—(Received February 18, 1881.)

SIR: A reference to Mr. Seward's dispatches Nos. 512, 590, and 692, not to speak of earlier dispatches on the same subject, will show that for a long time the representatives of foreign powers have been engaged in discussion with the Tsung-li Yamên upon the proper forms and terms to be employed in official intercourse between the consuls and provincial officers. The subject is one of exceptional importance in this empire, where so much stress is laid upon ceremonial and etiquette.

Sir Thomas Wade, the British minister, was charged several months ago, by the diplomatic body here, with conducting in their behalf negotiations in this matter with the foreign office. Finally a result has been reached, which is entirely satisfactory to the ministers, and one of which in the conferences recently held I have expressed my approbation. Copies of a communication from Prince Kung on the subject and his accompanying memorandum are inclosed. The latter sets forth the agreement decided on with brevity and clearness. You will observe that it determines the procedure upon three points.

First. A consular officer shall, without regard to any difference of rank between him and a governor-general or governor of a province, be received by the latter with the etiquette becoming for a host to exercise towards a guest.

Second. In official correspondence between consular officers and high provincial authorities, in order to avoid the appearence of subordination of the former, the following plan is to be adopted: In ordinary matters, the consular officers will address the intendant who will memorialize the viceroy or governor, and the latter will instruct the intendant to reply to the consular officers. In important matters the latter can exchange "official communications" with the high authorities, employing the term which does not signify inferiority or petition.

Third. The provincial authorities will, in addressing the consul, use the respectful term equivalent to "the honorable consul," and will abstain from that use of the vermilion pencil which they resort to in instructing their inferior officers.

In this country where pre-eminently forms are things, and where disagreements between foreign representatives and the Chinees officials have often seriously interfered with the transaction of important business, it is a matter of consequence to have reached so satisfactory a termination of the prolonged discussion on official intercourse.

I inclose a copy of my reply to Prince Kung's communication, and also a copy of my circular to our consuls, instructing them to comply with the terms of the memorandum in conducting their official intercourse with the provincial authorities.

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication in reply.

Upon the 21st of November, 1879, I had the honor to receive a dispatch from your excellency,* in which it was remarked that their excellencies the members of the diplomatic body had been engaged in conference upon all international matters to which attention seemed to be demanded, whether for the removal of what may be characterized as a grievence, or for the introduction of changes that will modify what is in appearance either unreasonable or inexpedient, and that they proposed to lay before me the conclusions at which they had arrived, &c. Upon the 26th of the same month a reply was sent by this office. Since then I have been in repeated consultations with his excellency Sir Thomas Wade upon one of the topics, and have deliberated upon a memorandum submitted, and upon the 20th ultimo I addressed to him a note in the premises.

Upon the 24th ultimo, I received a reply from him stating that the proposals in regard to the forms of intercourse between Chinese and foreign officials had been submitted by him in person to his colleagues and accepted by them, and requested me to communicate officially the conclusions arrived at to the several members of the diplomatic body, &c. Having sent instructions to the viceroys and governors of the various provinces for their information and guidance, I have now the honor to inclose a copy of the conclusions reached for your excellency's information.

Peking, December 10, 1880.

His Excellency JAMES B. ANGELL, &c., &c., &c.

[Inclosure.]

Memorandum on official intercourse.

A minute was received upon this subject some time since to which this Yamên has already replied in detail. But your excellency appears not to have been satisfied, and in converaation has repeatedly urged me to agree to a satisfactory conclusion of the matter. This Yamên, therefore, again submits a series of propositions given hereafter upon the several points at issue.

I. Your excellency maintains that, whether at a port or in the interior, a consular officer having occasion to speak to a governor-general or governor of a province on business, should be assured access to the high authority, and that neither when admitted into his Yamên nor into his presence should he be treated as the subordinate of the high authority, no matter what the inferiority of his official rank, but according to the etiquette between guest and host.

I beg to remark upon this, that in the provinces the high officials, from the viceroys and governors down to the intendants, are constantly meeting consular officers, and, although there may be differences of rank, there are none who fail to receive such officers according to the etiquette of guests.

Hereafter whenever business requires such meetings they certainly shall meet consular officers and treat them in all respects according to the etiquette observed between guest and host.

II. Your excellency holds that, whenever consular officers have occasion to hold official correspondence with the high provincial authorities, such correspondence should not take the form of a memorial from the lower to the higher or of an instruction from a higher to a lower, but that, without regard to actual superiority or inferiority of relative rank, the characters  "to correspond officially" should be used, the idea being to avoid the appearance of subordination.

Upon this article I remark that the treaties are not uniform upon this point. It is stated in some of them that consuls and acting consuls are of equal rank with intendants, and vice-consuls, acting vice-consuls, and interpreters of equal rank with prefects, and that these officials shall correspond upon a basis of equality, as befits their equality of rank.

If, while the organization of this government offers no serious objection, still it be inconvenient for viceroys and governors to correspond with consular officers with the use of the characters "wen yi," then certainly some feasible plan must be sought out. I suggest the following: In ordinary matters of business let consular officers, as heretofore, address the intendants, who will in turn memorialize the viceroy or governor. That high officer will, as heretofore, instruct the intendant in response, who will address the proper consular officer. But in important official matters of business the high provincial authorities and the consular officers, without regard to differences of rank, can on both sides use the words  "an official communication."

III. Your excellency suggests that whenever the provincial authorities, in correspondence, speak to a consul, they should prefix the character "Kuei" to his title, and that when mentioning a consul they should use his surname and title, as "Mr. Consul so and so." Further, that the provincial authorities should, in dispatches to consuls, cease to use the vermillion pencil to bracket or point certain characters as they do use it in instructing their subordinate officials.

These two suggestions contain nothing in any way inconsistent with the dignity of this government, and are assented to.

The foregoing is submitted to your excellency and the members of the diplomatic body as a practicable solution of this question, having in view the good relations between China and foreign powers.

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung

DECEMBER 18, 1880.

To His Imperial Highness Prince KUNG:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your imperial highness's communication of December 10 instant, and the accompanying memorandum on official intercourse. I beg to express my appreciation of the just spirit in which your highness has considered the subject of official intercourse, which is not free from difficulties.

I desire to express my satisfaction with the forms of procedure which are given in your memorandum to govern provincial officers and consular officers in their official intercourse with each other.

I shall at once instruct the consuls of the United States to comply with the terms of the memorandum.

I gladly embrace this opportunity to assure your imperial highness of my distinguished consideration.

I am, &c.,

Mr. Angell to United States consuls in China.

PEKING, December 19, 1880.

SIR: I am happy to inform you that the prolonged negotiations which have been going on so long between the foreign ministers and the Tsung-li Yamên on the subject of official intercourse have at last yielded an excellent result. A plan has been agreed upon, which it is confidently believed will go far to remove the annoyances and embarrassments to which consular officers have been subjected in the transaction of business with the provincial authorities. I have signified to Prince Kung my approbation of the plan.

The substance of its provisions is as follows:

1. Whenever consular officers have occasion to hold personal interviews with a governor or a governor-general, they shall not be treated as subordinates, but with the etiquette which a host shows to guests.

2. If consular officers have occasion to correspond about ordinary matters of business, they shall, as heretofore, address the intendants, who will in turn memorialize the viceroy or governor. That high officer will, as heretofore, instruct the intendant in response, who will address the proper consular officer. But in important official matters of business the high provincial authorities and the consular officers, without regard to differences of rank, can on both sides use the words "an official communication."
3. The provincial authorities shall in correspondence with a consul prefix the character "kuei" to his title, and shall cease to use the vermillion pencil to bracket or point certain characters, as they do use it in instructing subordinate officials. Prince Kung announces that instructions in accordance with his agreement have been sent to the viceroys and governors of the various provinces for their information and guidance.

It is, therefore, my duty to instruct you to comply with the above regulations in your official interviews and correspondence with the provincial officers.

You have the right to expect that they too will comply with them. Any failure on their part to carry out in good faith the arrangement now entered into by the imperial government is a proper subject for you to report promptly to this legation.

I have, &c.,

No. 81.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, December 29, 1880. (Received March 8, 1881.)

SIR: I have read with interest the suggestion of Mr. Consul Stahel, inclosed in your instruction No. 45, of October 4 last, that an attempt be made to secure by treaties with Japan and China protection in those countries by patent rights for American inventors. Though the commission plenipotentiary, for whose especial benefit the valuable inclosure is sent, has completed its work, I have given the subject consideration.

At present it is no doubt more easy and more important to secure the needed protection in Japan than in China.

After diligent inquiry I do not learn that the Chinese have any law or usage resembling our patent laws. It would, therefore, probably require considerable time and labor to secure a stipulation to protect foreign inventors. But moreover, very few of the Chinese, very few even of the officials, look with favor upon the introduction of labor-saving machines or foreign inventions of any kind. The foreigners resident at the ports may bring them in to a limited extent. But I fear that, for some time to come, the Chinese will not make sufficient use of our inventions to work much harm to our citizens. I wish the danger were greater. Still it is well to hold the subject under consideration in case of future revisions of treaties.

No. 85.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, December 31, 1880. (Received March 8, 1881.)

SIR: As every event which shows in a marked degree the reception of western ideas by this people and especially by their high officials is of public importance, I deem it not out of place to write briefly of the erection, mainly through the contributions of Chinese officials, of a hospital at Tientsin. This hospital is under the charge of western physicians.

In August, 1879, Dr. Mackenzie, of the London Missionary Society, Dr. Irwin, and Miss Howard were called by Li Hung Chang, the viceroy to attend his wife, whom the Chinese physicians had failed to relieve of serious disease. They were successful in their treatment of her case. Since then Miss Howard, who is a regularly educated physician sent out by the American Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society, has been much consulted by the wife of the viceroy. In recognition of the services of Dr. Mackenzie and Miss Howard the viceroy granted them the use of a portion of a temple as a hospital and dispensary. He soon became so much interested in their work that he listened favorably to the suggestion of Dr. Mackenzie to build a hospital. Accordingly he and other provincial officers contributed funds which have sufficed to pay nearly the whole cost of the building, and during the last year and a half the viceroy has given liberally for the payment of the current expenses for the care of patients. On the 2d of December the new hospital was formally opened. The foreign consuls and other distinguished guests were present and appropriate addresses were made.

There are and long have been other hospitals under the charge of missionary physicians. To some of these, as notably to that so long and successfully conducted by our distinguished citizen, Dr. Peter Parker, wealthy Chinese have made contributions. But this is, I think, the first hospital which has been erected, and which is supported wholly by funds contributed by the Chinese. This recognition of our methods of medical and surgical treatment, and this adoption of our plan of benevolent care for the sick and suffering poor, are certainly very gratifying. Every step like this which the Chinese take towards our ways of thinking and doing has really a public significance, and tends to facilitate our transaction of public business with them according to our western methods. This is my justification for occupying the attention of the Department with the subject of this communication.

No. 90.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 10, 1881. (Received March 8.)

SIR: I am in possession of the information—unofficial, but, I doubt not, perfectly authentic—that contracts have now been signed by the Great Northern Telegraph Company to construct a line of telegraph overland from Shanghai to Tientsin and Peking; and also a branch from Tientsin to Paoting-fu, the capital of this province. It is the purpose to complete the work by next winter.

Nothing but the military advantages to be gained by the use of the line in case of war has led the government to give its consent to this enterprise. The viceroy, Li Hung Chang, has been the active agent in pressing the government to give its assent.

The viceroy is also vigorously working to induce the government to build a railroad from Chinkiang to Peking.

The conservatives oppose the project, with the assertions that a railroad would give the foreigner easy access to the interior; that it would cause distress to the people, and that it would ruin the China Merchants' Steamship Company. I fear their arguments will prevail, unless the authorities can be persuaded that the railroad is a military necessity. Indeed, it would not be out of keeping with Chinese precedents if the telegraphic project should even now be abandoned, provided a peaceful adjustment of the difficulties with Russia is reached. Still it seems probable that the officials have been convinced by the advantages derived from the line between Tientsin and Taku that a further extension of the telegraphic system is desirable, and that the new project will really be carried out. The importance of such a forward step is too obvious to call for comment.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

No. 94.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 13, 1881. (Received March 8.)

SIR: Since my dispatch No. 58, of November 30 last, the discussion between the diplomatic body and the foreign office on the proposition to increase the duty on imports, and abolish the lekin on them, has advanced one stage.

On the 13th of December Sir Thomas Wade received from the foreign office a reply to the memorandum which he had presented to them in behalf of himself and his colleagues. A discussion between Sir Thomas and the foreign office, in respect to the exact import of a certain passage in the reply delayed the translation. But I now inclose a copy. At a conference held on the 4th instant, it was decided, by the unanimous vote of the foreign ministers, to instruct Sir Thomas Wade to say, with brevity to the foreign office, that their proposition is unsatisfactory.

You will observe that their proposition is to raise the duty on imports from 5 per cent. to 11½ per cent., and to free the goods from all lekin and charges of every sort in the interior. This is a very important proposition, even in that form. But the belief of the diplomatic body here is that the government may perhaps be brought to accept of 10 per cent. instead of 11½.

The British minister presented at the conference a rough draught of a paper, in which he expressed the opinion that if the proposed arrangement were adopted lekin would still, to a greater or less extent, be laid on foreign goods so long as it should be laid on native goods; and that, notwithstanding the frequent protests against it by the Chinese themselves, the native goods will probably not be exempted from it in many years. He was requested by the conference to write out his opinion on this subject more fully.

Since the conference Sir Thomas Wade has had an interview with the Tsung-li Yamên, and reported to them our dissatisfaction with the rate they propose—11½ per cent. He received the impression that they will probably agree to accept ten if we propose it. It will be borne in mind that none of the propositions mentioned will be recommended by the ministers here to their respective governments, except with these conditions annexed: First, that there shall be a court of reclamation to secure to importers the return of any lekin or other tax laid upon goods which have paid the stipulated duty; and second, that the scheme shall be experimental, tried for a limited time, until it shall be seen how it works.

I reserve a discussion of the very interesting and important subject until it is determined whether the diplomatic body and the foreign office can come to an agreement upon the rate of duty to be imposed.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure in No. 94.]

The writers have perused the memorandum handed them regarding the proposition to increase the duties on foreign goods.

It states that the half tariff duty is equivalent to the lekin levied in the provinces, and that inasmuch as in the port provinces, where the trade in foreign goods is comparatively large, the lekin and other charges amount to a tariff duty and a half duty, in the provinces inland of these, where the trade in foreign goods is comparatively small, the lekin and charges thereon can amount but to two-tenths (1 per cent.) or at the most three-tenths (1½ per cent.) ad valorem.

To make any arrangement possible in affairs in which Chinese and foreigners are conjointly concerned, the essential condition is that thought should so be bestowed upon it on both sides as to enable each to arrive at what is just. The object of the foreign representatives being the advantage of the merchant, they will hold naturally that as regards any addition to the duty, the less that can be added to it the better. But it is incumbent on the Chinese Government, when projecting measures to be adopted, to look at both sides of the question in its integrity, and while mercantile interests are advantaged, yet more to see that no loss befall the state's revenue. Thus possibly may it be enabled at the same time to do justice and to make a settlement that will endure.

The lekin besides (which it is now proposed should no more be levied on foreign goods) is of consequence to the support of the provincial armies. The proposition under review is that after payment of an additional duty, which is to be levied at the same time as the (original) tariff duty, on foreign goods when they enter port, nothing farther in the shape of lekin or other duty of any kind or denomination shall be levied on these goods when they are carried inland from the port, or from any place to which they may have been carried inland, to any other place. This single payment of duty will be a considerable advantage to the merchant.

But now on the other side. The Chinese Government on its part is to collect duty but once, and the lekin and charges which should be collected at different stations, whenever foreign goods arrive at these, are to be altogether foregone. If the amount of this single collection prove an inadequate substitute for the revenue derived from the lekin and charges collected at those different stations, to say nothing of the myriad difficulties that would beset such a scheme in its operation, it is to be assumed that considering the friendly terms on which foreign governments have long been with the Government of China, no foreign representative would desire to introduce a measure that, while it purported nominally to increase the tariff, in reality made China suffer by the loss of lekin. In a conference with Sir Thomas Wade some time ago the ministers suggested an addition that would have raised the tariff to 12.5 taels. This reduction (from a previous estimate) was made after much deliberation, and was in point of fact not considered by the provincial authorities a fair equivalent for what is collected as lekin or other (inland) duties. The distances to which goods are carried are some greater and some less, and while the lekin levied on foreign goods sold in the provinces near the port is (admitted to be) more than the barrier duty (half duty), there is greater difficulty in estimating what will be the amount levied on goods as they are being carried for sale to provinces more remote.

When therefore the ministers resolved on proposing as a mezzo termine the addition of a single tariff duty to the tariff duty and half duty (now leviable) they were arguing the point in all fairness.

But the foreign representatives requiring a farther reduction on the part of China, the ministers have had nothing for it but to make every effort towards concession. They accordingly farther reduced (the proposed addition) by five mace. By the free circulation of foreign goods in all parts (under these conditions) foreign merchants will be benefited in no mean degree. The Chinese Government will lose by it, but not so very much.

The ministers would add that having considered (this question) twice and again, they do not attempt (do not propose) to engage in an exchange of arguments controversially, a vain waste of correspondence and verbal discussion. They present a plain statement to the representatives, viz, that they have reduced their estimate by five mace, in addition to the five mace before taken off it—by one tael, that is, in all—thus making (the total duty) 11 taels, 5 mace. This is a reduction extraordinary and the farthest length in that direction that when every point has been strained they find they can go. It is their hope that it may meet the requirement. It would be difficult for them to make any farther concession. The representatives, they imagine, will appreciate the pains they have been at to meet their wishes.

No. 95.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 14, 1881. (Received March 8.)

SIR: In my dispatch No. 52, of November 22 last, I described the state of the negotiations at that date between the diplomatic body and the foreign office on the subject of transit passes outwards. I referred to the draught of a paper presented by Mr. von Brandt at a conference on November 22, setting forth, at the request of the Tsung-li Yamên, the reasons for the rules suggested by the foreign representatives. A copy of that paper has since been furnished by Mr. von Brandt, and I inclose it. It will be remembered that according to the understanding of the conference, Mr. von Brandt was to present this communication to the foreign office as simply his own, but he was authorized to say at the close of it that the foreign representatives were unable to understand why the Chinese Government should object to Sections II and III, without which the proposed arrangement would not be acceptable.

To the communication of Mr. von Brandt the Tsung-li Yamên, on December 5, sent a reply, a copy of which is inclosed. They still express objections to Sections II and III, and they ask for a list of the native articles which by treaty are duty free.

Owing to the illness of Mr. von Brandt no conference was held last month. But one was held on the 4th instant and the Yamên's reply was considered. It was decided to adhere to the propositions before made, save that Rule II should be changed so as to indicate specifically what articles of foreign manufacture or origin, and what articles of foreign or native manufacture or origin, shall be duty free. A copy of the amended Rule II is inclosed.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 95.]

Mr. Von Brandt to the Ministers of the Tsung-li Yamên.

PEKING, November 20, 1880.

On the 19th instant the undersigned had the honor to receive the visit of their excellencies Shen, Lin Wang, Chung, and Hsia. They informed him that, notwithstanding the opposition from the provinces, the Yamên was willing to agree to section I, rule 9, of the proposals laid before them by the undersigned, but that in view of the strong objections raised from the same quarter they could except neither section II nor section III of the same proposals.

At the close of the conference the ministers suggested to the undersigned to place before the Yamên in writing his reasons for desiring to maintain the two sections, and the undersigned agreed to do so after having taken the sense of his colleagues, the representatives of the other treaty powers. The reasons which caused the foreign representatives to place before the Yamên in May last the proposals contained in the three sections now under discussion were to do away with such difficulties as had arisen from time to time, and which, while they seriously interfered with the interests of trade, were likely to create and continue disagreements and ill-feelings between the local officials and the consuls as well as between the Government of China and those of the treaty powers.

The Tsung-li Yamên having repeatedly complained of abuses in the use of transit passes outwards, the representatives of the treaty powers made it their first object to remove all causes of complaint in relation to this subject. The restrictions as to the time within which transit passes must be used and within which native produce brought down under transit passes must be exported, as well as all the rules contained in section I of the proposals, are so many concessions, and important concessions, made by the foreign representatives to the Tsung-li Yamên; even rule 9, instituting a joint investigation in cases of fines and confiscations, arising under the stipulations contained in section I, may be fairly considered at least partly a concession to the Yamên, as by treaty the investigation of cases of fines belongs solely to the consul of the defendant.

While thus showing their earnest desire to consult the wishes of the Chinese Government and to comply with them, it was the duty of the foreign representatives to see at the same time that also the causes of those complaints were removed, which had been repeatedly urged by them upon the attention of the Tsung-li Yamên.

It was for this cause that sections II and III were introduced into the new proposals.

Neither the one nor the other claims any new advantages for the treaty powers, but they simply reassert rights granted to them by former treaties, a reassertion rendered necessary by the persistent efforts of some local authorities to ignore them.

Section II reasserts the right that certain articles of native produce, very few in number and very unimportant indeed, are free from export duty under Rule II of the regulations for trade. Alinea 2, of Rule I, of the regulations for trade, &c., mentions the articles in the list of duty-free goods as exempt from the ad valorem duty, which is paid by articles mentioned neither in the import nor in the export tariff. It is not necessary to enter upon a discussion of the Chinese text of the rules in question, as under article 5 of the German treaty of 1861, in cases of dissent, the French text is the one to be relied upon. I have the honor to hand herewith to the Yamên the French text of Rules I and II of the German treaty, and I have full confidence in the good faith and impartiality of the Chinese Government in expressing the conviction that in the face of this French text the pretentions of some local authorities to levy export duty on the articles mentioned in trade Rule II as duty free will be done away with forever.

But even in this section a concession is made to the Yamên by the foreign representatives in admitting the levy of a coast-trade duty on duty-free native produce, a new proof of the conciliatory and friendly spirit in which these proposals have been draughted, a spirit which, I am sorry to say, seems to be understood or appreciated neither by the provincial authorities nor by the Yamên itself.

Section III also contains nothing new, but reasserts only the right of foreign merchants to buy native produce at the ports and to export it without being bound to produce receipts for the payment of inland taxes, this latter rule holding good only for produce bought by foreigners in the interior and brought down under transit passes. The rule that on goods manufactured at the ports only export duty shall be levied is also in entire conformity with the stipulations of the treaties.

The undersigned trusts that this short review of the rules contained in the proposals submitted by him in the name of his colleagues to the Yamên will convince their excellencies that while these proposals contain many new and important concessions to the Chinese Government they contain nothing to which the treaty powers have not a full and undoubted right under the former treaties. It is for these reasons that the undersigned cannot admit that only one or two of the sections composing the proposals are accepted, while the other sections are rejected. The proposals stand as a whole, and have to be accepted or rejected as a whole. They were made by the foreign representatives in a spirit of moderation and friendliness, and the Yamên will have to bear the responsibility of their rejection.

As the decision of the Yamên in the one or the other direction will involve instructions to be forwarded to the German consular authorities in the provinces, the undersigned would feel obliged to their excellencies for a speedy reply. The undersigned is, at the same time, authorized by his colleagues, the representatives of France, Great Britain, Spain, Russia, and the United States, to state that they are equally unable with him to understand on what grounds the Chinese Government objects to the adoption of sections II and III, without which the arrangement would not be acceptable to them.

I avail myself,

VON BRANDT.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 95.]

Tsung-li Yamên to Mr. von Brandt.

DECEMBER 5, 1880.

A few days ago the ministers of the Yamên received a note from his excellency Mr. von Brandt to the effect that he had been charged by his colleagues, the representatives of the treaty powers, to state that the provisional rules in three sections for the regulations of transit trade outwards must be accepted in their entirety. The note was accompanied by a document in a foreign language.

The ministers would observe that the Chinese text of Rule II of the regulations for trade, appended to the treaties, with reference to duty free goods, contains the word "foreign" only, while the text, which runs on consecutively without a break, does not specially indicate which are native goods and which are foreign. As, however, at the close of this same rule it is distinctly stated that all goods sent into the interior will, as in other cases, pay a duty of teals 2.5, it may be seen that it is foreign goods which are referred to.

A translation of the foreign document forwarded by Mr. von Brandt has now been made (and it is found) that here also only the word "foreign" is employed with reference to the articles enumerated in this document, the word Chinese not occurring at all. A Chinese translation of the document in question is forwarded for his excellency's perusal.

The note under acknowledgment observes that the few articles of (native) produce that are duty free are unimportant (lit. fractional and miscellaneous). Since they are few and since they are unimportant, the duty upon them would not probably amount to much, and the Yamên have to request Mr. von Brandt to furnish them with a list of the names of these "few and unimportant articles of native produce."

As regards the (sections relating to the) purchase of native produce by foreign merchants, one is to the effect that goods purchased in the interior under transit pass shall pay the export duty as well as the half duty. The other is to the effect that produce brought down by native merchants upon which inland dues and lekin have been paid, shall, when purchased by a foreigner at a treaty port, be liable only to the export duty and not to the half duty as well.

The arrangements proposed under the above two sections being already stipulated for in the treaties and trade regulations should be enunciated (afresh), but there can be no necessity for the introduction of other remarks, which would lead to considerable confusion. Again, if foreign merchants be permitted to manufacture native produce before submitting it to the inspection of the customs, many abuses will most certainly arise in consequence of the confusion caused by the substitution of one article for another.

The provision for inspection is intended only to guard against abuse.

If Monsieur von Brandt will agree to the adoption of an arrangement in the spirit of these two rules, as previously forwarded to him by the Yamên, the question of their being given effect to can be considered simultaneously with the rest.

Compliments, &c.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 95.]

RULE II.

The following goods shall be duty free:

OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURE OR ORIGIN.	OF FOREIGN OR NATIVE MANUFACTURE OR ORIGIN.
Foreign coins,	Gold and silver in bullion,
Foreign confectionary,	Flour,
Foreign clothing,	Indian meal,
Foreign candles,	Sago,
Foreign tobacco,	Biscuits,
Foreign cigars,	Preserved meats and vegetables,
Foreign medicines,	Cheese,
Foreign plated-ware,	Butter,
Foreign perfumery,	Jewelry,
Foreign wine, beer, and spirits,	Soap,
Foreign stationery,	Charcoal,
Foreign carpeting,	Fire-wood,
Foreign druggeting,	Household stores,
Foreign glass and crystal-ware.	Ship stores,
	Personal baggage,
	Cutlery.

The above, when of foreign manufacture or origin, pay no import duty nor coast-trade duty; when of native manufacture no export duty nor coast-trade duty; but if duty-free goods of foreign manufacture or origin are transported into the interior they will, with the exception of personal baggage, gold and silver bullion, and foreign coins, pay a transit duty at the rate of 2½ per cent. ad valorem.

Paragraph 3, as before.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

[Extract.]

No. 103.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 25, 1881. (Received March 25.)

SIR: On the 19th instant Mr. Shishido, the Japanese minister, called to take his leave of me before his departure for home. He took the opportunity to have a very interesting confidential conversation with me concerning the proceedings of the Chinese Government which had rendered it necessary, in his opinion, for him to withdraw from this capital. He also left with me a written argument on the subject, which I enclose. This also was given to me confidentially. Mr. Shishido informed me that he was confiding this information to none of the other foreign ministers here, but that, as the negotiations might be said to have been begun at the suggestion of General Grant, he was desirous that this legation should be advised of what had really happened.

The substance of his verbal statement was as follows:

General Grant, after interviews with high officials, both of China and of Japan, recommended that the two nations should appoint commissioners to adjust by treaty the difficulties which had arisen concerning the Lew Chew Islands. China requested Japan to join with her in complying with this recommendation. Japan accordingly appointed Mr. Shishido, the minister at Peking, as its high commissioner, and the foreign office here informed him that Prince Kung and the ministers of the Tsung-li Yamên were appointed as the high commissioners of China. Negotiations were begun, and after three months' work a treaty was agreed on. On the 21st of October the Tsung-li Yamên agreed to sign the treaty in ten days. At the expiration of the time they were not ready to sign, and on the 20th of November they announced to him that an imperial decree had been issued, referring the whole subject to the northern and southern superintendents of trade for consideration and report. He had waited until now in vain for any further progress on the part of the Chinese Government, and felt that it was due to his office and to his government that he should withdraw from this court and return to his own country.

* * * * * * *

In answer to my inquiry Mr. Shishido said he had not been formally recalled by his government. I was therefore, in error in the statement I made on that point in my No. 96, of January 17. He added that his government had left it to his discretion to determine whether and when he should leave Peking.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Shishido desired my opinion concerning his course in the negotiations, and especially concerning his departure. I told him that I could not venture to say anything touching the main question under consideration by China and Japan, but that assuredly, if in the recent negotiations of our commission, the Chinese commissioners had refused to sign our treaties after they had agreed to sign them, I should have withdrawn from the capital.

Mr. Shishido informed me that the secretary of legation, Mr. Tanabe, who accompanied him on the visit, would be left in charge of the legation for the present.

The argument, which Mr. Shishido left, goes over the ground which he traversed in his interview with me, but presents his points with somewhat more precision and sharpness than characterized the verbal statement, at least as it reached me through his interpreter, whose knowledge of English is very limited. I have no reason to doubt its accuracy, though I have heard no counter statement of the Tsung-li Yamên.

I know that some members of the Yamên have admitted that the subject was referred to the superintendents of trade. But the foreign office do not seem to be at all disturbed by the departure of the Japanese minister. The members speak of it rather jocosely. Whether in their elation at the escape from war with Russia they underrate the possible significance of this event, or whether having nothing further to fear from Russia they are now quite ready to meet the claim of Japan to the Lew Chew Islands with a bold front, I will not undertake to decide. But, certainly, even if they have justice on their side in opposing the seizure of the islands by Japan, they could not well contrive a better way to alienate the sympathy of all civilized nations from them in their assertion of their rights than by the course, which, if we accept the statement of Mr. Shishido, they have now seen fit to take in their negotiations with Japan.

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure in No. 103.—Translation.]

[Extract.]

An argument on the differences between the two governments (Japan and China) with a view to the preservation of peace and to avoid bloodshed.

Section I discusses the correspondence had between the two governments.

Section II narrates the course of negotiations between the envoys appointed, and section III shows that one government has rejected its own propositions.

The two governments of Japan and China having appointed high commissioners by mutual agreement to negotiate and close the Lew Chew question, and these high commissioners having reached a point of agreement, it was not expected that China would make these negotiations ridiculous, and thus render difficult a satisfactory adjustment of the question.

According to the rules of international law, when two powers appoint representatives for purposes of negotiation, such persons are to be provided with full powers, in order that the representatives so appointed may be enabled, each for his own government, in negotiation to represent fully the desire of the appointing power. After the given negotiation has come to a satisfactory issue the representatives are to affix their hands and seals as a witness to its validity. The appointment of representatives without full powers is not merely idle, but is abundantly calculated to develop a growth of mutual entanglements, and to promote hostile feeling.

If one power appoints a representative with full powers and the other power appoints a representative without such full powers, this other power in so doing not only violates the provisions of international law and treats discourteously the representative of the other power concerned, but, having at the inception of negotiations notified the other government that power to negotiate had been received, and then, when negotiations had been successfully concluded, to maintain that no authority to sign had been given, this evasion, what is it but an attempt to trifle with the other representative and an insult to his government?

If it be asserted that the signatures can only be affixed after the receipt of a decree authorizing it, and that this is the rule of procedure, is not this course detrimental to the full powers of the representatives? For the universal practice is that the representatives on either side having concluded their negotiations, affix their seals and signatures in witness, and thereafter mutually seek the ratifications of their respective governments in final conclusion of the treaty made. It is not the practice in any government to seek the ratification of the head of the government prior to signing and sealing the treaty as concluded. For one representative to delay signing and sealing the treaty until he has secured the ratification of his government is to subject the other representatives to delay, and to force him to discard the authority given him. Thus the interests of one party alone are conserved, both are not alike regarded, and this is not in accord with international law.

The appointment of commissioners by the two governments to discuss and settle this question was in accordance with the thought which originated with the ex-President of the United States (General Grant). General Grant, in a letter to Prince Kung, suggested "the appointment, by mutual consent, of high commissioners to discuss and conclude this question, &c." Can it be held that his idea was to appoint representatives without full powers, and thus to indulge in a great amount of useless discussion? That China was not at the outset deceived as to the purport of this suggestion from General Grant is abundantly proved by what follows:

The proposition that the two governments should act on this suggestion of General Grant came, in the first instance, from China. For upon the 14th of December, 1879, the Chinese foreign office began by addressing the foreign office of Japan in a dispatch which declared that China desired to act upon the suggestion contained in General Grant's letter for the settlement of all questions involved. Thereafter, April 19, 1880, the Chinese foreign office inquired what person would be appointed by my government for the negotiations. Upon Ming Chik, 13th year, 6th moon, 29th day (Japanese) my government appointed the undersigned, being Japanese minister at Peking, as its high commissioner for the purposes above mentioned, with full powers, by an imperial decree, which was duly reported by the Japanese foreign office to the Chinese foreign office for its information. Thereafter, Ming Chik, 13th year, 7th moon, 26th day (Japanese), I again notified the foreign office here of my appointment and inquired what persons had been appointed and where our negotiations should be conducted.

August 5, 1880, the Chinese foreign office informed the Japanese foreign office and me that an imperial decree had been received saying, "Get the prince and the ministers of Yamên concerned negotiate and settle the questions, etc., etc." This carefulness on both sides shows clearly that the object of the appointment of commissioners was, as stated above, to negotiate upon this business.

The high commissioners having, in obedience to their several edicts of appointment, discussed and debated matters for about three months, at last reached an agreement. October 10, 1880, the foreign office wrote me, saying, "Our opinions upon the several points are in accord, &c., &c."

October 21, 1880, the ministers of the foreign office stated to me in conversation that in the treaty negotiations they had mentioned three matters: 1st. A settlement of the Lew Chew question; 2d. An addition to the former treaty between the two powers; and 3d. A modification of the form of ratification. These three matters were combined together. At the outset I opened the discussion upon these matters, and the Chinese foreign office agreed in the conclusions which were reached; the final draft of the treaty was written by the Tsung-li Yamên, to which I had no objection. At that time it was understood that the treaty was to be signed and sealed within ten days. The Chinese ministers informed me that after signing and sealing the treaty it would be necessary to ask for the ratification of the treaty in the matters of the settlement of the Lew Chew question and the addition to the former treaty. I estimated that three months must be allowed for the transmission of the treaty to Japan and the return of it as ratified, when the certificates of ratification might be exchanged at Peking.

Thus four sections in all were finished as completing the treaty, and the dates of exchange of ratifications and of putting the treaty into effect were alldetermined.

After all this I was confident that the Yamên would sign and seal the treaty upon the day named, and I wrote to the ministers three or four times, urging them, but they delayed and gave me no answer. Much to my surprise, on the 20th December, 1880, I received a dispatch from the Chinese foreign office, stating that an imperial decree had been received in the following terms: "Let the project for the settlement of the Lew Chew question, as submitted to us by the foreign office, with all the papers, be referred to the northern and southern superintendents of foreign trade, for reports. After their reports have been received we will issue our further commands. Respect this."

Judging from the language of this dispatch the authority to arrange the Lew Chew matter did not rest with the prince and ministers of the foreign office alone, but the northern and southern superintendents of foreign trade were also included. The prince and ministers had not the authority to deal with these questions; they had the full power to make a fair copy of the treaty, but not the authority to sign it.

At the outset China expressed her desire to act in accordance with the suggestion of General Grant, and appointed high commissioners to negotiate, but later she declared that the high commissioners so appointed had not the authority alone to sign the result of their negotiations. At the outset she informed Japan that the prince and ministers of the Yamén should deal with the questions, but later she declared that the northern and southern superintendents of trade must consider these same questions and report to the throne.

My government accepted the suggestion of General Grant, and in accordance with international law clothed her high commissioner with full power to dispose of the questions at issue.

But the other government appointed commissioners having no power, and opened up a useless discussion.

No. 109.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, February 9, 1881. (Received April 14.)

SIR: I have to announce to you that his excellency Shen Kuei-fen, assistant grand secretary of state, president of the board of war, and, after Prince Kung, the leading member of the foreign office, died after a brief illness, on January 29. I inclose the Imperial decree, a copy of which was communicated to me by Prince Kung, which sets forth his merits and shows the esteem in which he was held by the government, and a copy of my response. He belonged to the party which is least unfriendly to foreigners and to foreign ideas, though he was too cautious or too timid to be very demonstrative.

He brought a most amiable temper to all negotiations, but, when occasion required, was master of those "arts of delay" which characterize Chinese diplomacy.

In the negotiation of the recent treaties with the commission plenipotentiary the deceased minister took a much more active part than the Chinese commissioners who were especially appointed. It seemed to be largely due to his desire to expedite the work that we were able to complete it in so short a time.

It will be fortunate for China and for foreign powers if a man as well disposed to foreign nations succeeds to Shen Kuei-fen's position of influence in the Tsung-li Yamên.

I have, &c.,

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

Upon the 1st instant I was honored by the receipt of an edict from His Imperial Majesty, in terms as follows: "Shen Kuei-fen, late assistant grand secretary of state and president of the board of war, a man of pure heart, cautious in his disposition, a loyal statesman, of sedulous habits, tried ability, an upright nature, respectful and attentive to his duties, commenced his career as a Han Lin (member of the Imperial Academy) and gradually rose to the distinction of subdirector of one of the lower courts. He was then made one of the high provincial officers. In the reign of our predecessor, Tung Chih, he was chosen to be one of the counselors in the grand council and was subsequently made president of one of the boards. After our accession to the throne, relying greatly on his integrity and ability, we raised him to the rank of assistant grand secretary of state. In the management of all state affairs he always exerted himself with his whole mind and strength, and when wearied and exhausted did not seek to be excused. Recently, because he had met with a slight ailment we granted him leave to nurse his health, but the unexpected intelligence of his death which has now reached Us, has smitten Us with profound grief. Let there be given him a "To Lo Ching-pei".* Let the Bei Le (prince of the third rank) Tsai Yi conduct ten officers of the Imperial guard and forthwith proceed to his house to offer a libation; and as an addition of Our favor, let there be conferred upon him the posthumous title of 'grand tutor of the heir apparent,' and let the same honors be done to his memory as if he were a grand secretary of state. Let his tablet be placed in the Hsien Liang-tsz.† Let all his shortcomings during his official career be blotted out and forgotten. Let a grant of 2,000 taels from the Imperial treasury be made towards defraying his funeral expenses. Let the proper Yamên study the regulations for honoring the dead and memorialize as to what is due to his memory, and when the deceased officer's body is being conveyed to his birthplace, let the authorities on the road do what the circumstances may require. Let the decree of Chii jen (provincial graduate) be bestowed upon his son, Shen-men-t'ao, and let him be accorded the same privilege of competing at the metropolitan examinations which belongs to that class of students. Let his grandson, Shen hsi kuei, born with hereditary distinction of the first rank, be granted the position of senior secretary of a board.

"The foregoing edict is made known as a proof of the high estimation in which the deceased officer's virtues and abilities were held by Us.

"Respect this!"

It becomes my duty to transmit a copy of this edict for the information of your excellency.

Peking, February 7, 1881.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 109.]

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

FEBRUARY 9, 1881.

YOUR IMPERIAL HIGHNESS: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt this morning, of Your Imperial Highness's communication of the 7th instant, inclosing an edict from His Imperial Majesty concerning the death of his excellency Shen Kuei-fen, assistant grand secretary of state, and president of the board of war.

I desire to express to you, my high appreciation of his signal merits and my sincere sorrow at his decease. In my brief acquaintance with him, I was much impressed with his ready grasp of all subjects brought before him, his perfect mastery of details, his singularly retentive memory, and the courteous and amiable spirit which he evinced in the most earnest discussions. The empire may well mourn the loss, while in the full vigor of his intellectual strength, of one who has performed so many eminent public services, who was so wise a counselor to His Imperial Majesty, and who was so esteemed by all the representatives of foreign powers.

I shall communicate the edict of His Imperial Majesty to my government, who will, with deep regret, receive the sad tidings of the decease of the distinguished statesman, whose name has become so well known to them.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

No. 151.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

No. 120.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, February 28, 1881. (Received April 27.)

SIR: I desire to call your attention to a change which the Chinese Government has recently made, and made in an objectionable manner, to the regulations for the chartering by foreigners of junks on the Yangtze River.

I inclose a dispatch from Mr. Consul Shepard, of Hankow, which gave me my first information on the subject, and which states very clearly what has happened at Hankow.

It appears that ever since the revised regulations "of trade on the Yangtze Kiang" (for which see Mayer's Treaties, pp. 209–211), which went into effect in January, 1863, the regular course of business in chartering and dispatching junks has been substantially as follows: The original charter-party, in Chinese and in English, was deposited in the consulate. The consul then made an application to the foreign customs for a "special junk pass" for the charterer. On the presentation of this paper to the customs the charterer was allowed to ship his cargo. He then received from our consul a clearance on which it was expressly stated: "The United States flag is not to be raised on the junk." He was then furnished by the foreign custom, 1st, a river pass and arms certificate; 2d, a cargo certificate in English and Chinese; 3d, a duty-paid receipt and a tonnage-dues receipt in one document; and, 4th, a bond certificate. Provided with these documents the junk proceeded on her voyage down to Chinkiang with no further detention at customs stations and lekin barriers than was necessary to examine her papers. But if she lacked any one of the above-named papers, she was liable to be detained or even turned back. This procedure has been followed for about eighteen years.

On the 29th of November last, Mr. Jenkins, an American citizen, who has been engaged in chartering junks at Hankow, found, to his surprise, on applying to one of the shipping hongs, that the native owners had been notified, as they said, that hereafter they would be required to pay port dues along the route on a junk chartered by a foreigner, and that they would be held responsible for lekin dues on the cargo at every barrier, even though it had paid duty at the foreign customs.

Bear in mind that no notice of any contemplated change in the regulations had been given by the provincial authorities to our consul, or by the Tsung-li Yamên to the foreign ministers.

On the 6th of December a proclamation, a copy of which is inclosed, from the Wu Chang prefect was posted on the walls of Hankow, notifying boat hongs and boat owners that the owners of junks must pay the port dues to the native customs even when the junks are chartered by foreigners.

On the 8th of December Mr. Jenkins learned on inquiry at the foreign customs that they would not receive tonnage dues on chartered junks, nor would they note on the papers they should issue the payment of such dues to the native customs. Some correspondence ensued between the consul and the commissioner of foreign customs, which it is not necessary to dwell upon here further than to say that, in answer to an inquiry by the consul, the commissioner informed him in a brief note that no change had been made except the adoption of the procedure described in article VI of the Yangtze regulations, namely, the levying of port dues instead of tonnage dues, and when the consul rejoined, giving the substance of the reports which the junk owners had brought of the intended detention of chartered junks, and assessment of lekin on the cargoes at every barrier, the commissioner, very improperly, as I think, omitted to make any reply.

December 24, Hoo, Taotai of Hankow, sent the consul a dispatch which, substantially in the language of the prefect's proclamation above referred to, gave him notice of the change in the regulations, and on December 27 the consul received a similar dispatch from the Ichang taotai. Accompanying the latter were extracts from correspondence had in 1877 between the foreign office and Mr. Fraser, then Her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires at Peking, concerning the levying of port dues on a native boat, in which an Englishman and his family reached Wuhu. The conclusion of the correspondence is not given, but the British minister has promised to obtain it for me. In its present form it is of no value, and therefore I do not transmit it to you.

You will observe in reading the prefect's proclamation that the orders of the Tsung-li Yamên reached him on the 6th of November, and yet it was not until the 24th of December that the taotai of Hankow wrote to our consul on the matter.

It is probable that the Chinese have been prompted to their action by their desire to correct certain abuses which have sprung up on the Yangtze. It is also highly probable that the government has been defrauded by foreigners selling their names to Chinese in chartering junks and securing transit passes which prevented the levying of port dues and lekin. Of course we do not object to their seeking a remedy for this trouble. We are bound to do what we can to prevent our citizens from becoming parties to any such fraud. But the remedies must be sought in consonance with the treaties. Mr. Consul Shepard in his No. 357, to the taotai, referred to in his dispatch, quoted the stipulations concerning the hiring of boats, which are found in the several treaties, and made substantially the summary of principles which is found in his dispatch.

After learning from my colleagues of the diplomatic corps that none of them had received from the Tsung-li Yamên any announcement of the new regulation, I sought an interview with the foreign office, and on the 13th instant had a long conference with them on the matter under consideration. I began by inquiring whether any new regulation had been made by them concerning the chartering of junks by foreigners. They said, "No;" but an old one had been enforced. I asked if it had been enforced during the last seventeen years. They admitted that it had not been. I asked if the provincial authorities were not derelict in not informing our consul of so important a change until seven weeks after they had received their information. They said, "Yes." I then asked if they did not think that it would have been better for the Tsung-li Yamên to inform the foreign ministers at the outset, so that the ministers could notify their consuls, or make objections, if they had any to make. They were less willing to condemn themselves than they had been to condemn the provincial authorities. They argued that the regulation concerned natives alone, not the foreigners. Of course I reminded them that it very deeply concerned foreigners who chartered junks, and that to make so important a change in a procedure which had been recognized for seventeen years without giving the ministers and consuls timely notice was a step well calculated to cause trouble. I then sought to ascertain what their order really was. They referred to frauds which had been practiced, and said that the requirement is simply that the native owners must pay port dues according to Chinese law. This requires, you will remember, that a native boat pays port dues at every port she enters, while by the treaties foreign vessels engaged in the coastwise trade pay only once in four months, no matter how many ports they enter. They assured me, however, contrary to Mr. Shepard's apprehensions, that the regulation does not in any way change the status of a cargo on which the foreigner has paid duties, that such a cargo is not to be subjected to lekin anywhere on the voyage if the shipper has all the proper papers as before except the certificate for the payment of tonnage dues. The boats, they said, might be stopped at Kinkiang and Wuhu for port dues, to be paid by the owners.

They argued that their action was sustained by article VI of the Yangtze Regulations, a part of which I copy:

ARTICLE VI. Native craft, owned or chartered by British merchants, will pay duty on their cargo at the rates leviable on such cargo under the treaty tariff. All such craft will further have to be secured by bond in the manner laid down in the provisional rules published on the 5th December, 1861; and on entry into any port will pay port dues according to Chinese tariff. * * *

I asked them how they could reconcile their new regulation with the following clause in the (amended) twenty-second article of the French treaty of Tientsin, which amended article was adopted in 1865, two years after the adoption of the Yangtze regulations: "Native craft, chartered by French merchants, shall in like manner (i. e. to French vessels) pay tonnage dues once in every four months."

It would seem that they had forgotten or overlooked this provision. For at first they denied that there was any such provision. But when the treaty was brought they could of course deny no longer. They admitted that the matter deserved consideration. After some reflection and consultation they intimated that this might not apply to the Yangtze ports, but only to the seaports. On my requesting them to show me the authority for any such exemption they were unable to do so. I told them in conclusion that I would not press the point any further at that time, but I begged them to give the matter their careful attention. I chose to drop it there for the time, because the other foreign ministers have evinced much interest in the subject, and it is not improbable that some joint action may be taken which would be more likely to secure a result than my unaided prosecution of the matter.

In reviewing the subject it is clear, I think, that, even if the action of the government in changing the usage of eighteen years is justifiable at all, the neglect of the Tsung-li Yamên to inform the foreign ministers of their decision and the neglect of the provincial authorities promptly to inform the consuls of the orders received from Peking are deserving of grave censure.

Further, it is my opinion that the adoption in 1865 of the amended twenty-second article of the French treaty supersedes the sixth article of the Yangtze regulations so far as this sixth article is irreconcilable with it. I have reason to believe that most, if not all, of the foreign ministers here will agree with me on that point. We shall probably soon have a consultation on the subject. Until we have conferred I shall defer action.

Mean time I am informing Mr. Consul Shepard of the details of my interview with the foreign office, and am authorizing him to inform our citizens of the assurance which the foreign office has given me that the cargoes of foreigners, when shipped in junks, are not to be subjected to lekin if the duties have been duly paid. Of course such a levy would be the most flagrant violation of the treaties.

I have, however, called the consul's attention to the need of exercising the utmost vigilance to prevent any of our citizens from becoming parties to such frauds as may have stimulated the Chinese Government to take the action complained of.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 120.]

Mr. Shepard to Mr. Angell.

No. 55.] JANUARY 14, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith to your excellency inclosures appertaining to the subject-matter of this dispatch, twelve in number, marked respectively A, B, C, D^1, and D^2, E, F, G, H^1, and H^2, I^1, and I^2, to be referred to in the course of this communication.*

* Inclosures referred to omitted from this publication.

Since my response in No. 53, to your inquiries in your No. 4, of October 11, 1880, regarding "tonnage dues," &c., circumstances of an important nature have transpired here and along the river ports, seriously and injuriously affecting foreign interests, interfering in what has for years been recognized as legitimate commercial enterprise, and as I think warranted, and intended to have been secured by the various treaties. At the expense of some prolixity I feel it incumbent on me to explain the whole matter to your excellency, that such steps as may be wise and called for in the exigency may be undertaken with full intelligence of the facts and their bearings.

In the early months of last year, 1880, Her Britannic Majesty's consul, Alabasker, discovered what he deemed, and I presume were, irregularities in the dealings of certain of his constituents with native Chinese. The alleged irregularities consisted in selling the name of the British subject to certain natives, to be used by them in securing, under British protection, transit passes for merchandise outward and inward, charters for junks, and all similar privileges guaranteed to foreigners by the treaties. Without commenting on the method of procedure against the parties, both foreign and native, I may say that the matter created a good deal of excitement and resulted in a general suspicion against all foreigners in like business on the part of the native officials, and an interference on their part with lawful and honorable transactions. Formulated complaints were made to me by the Taotai against the American traders here, Messrs. M. A. Jenkins and Wadleigh & Emory. I gave them such candid examination as I could without books or witnesses to substantiate the charges, and found no sufficient evidence that either honorable principles of trade or treaty privileges had been violated by them, and especially not by Mr. Jenkins, who has been in business here for many years. I refer to the affair, not only to give you an idea of the probable origin of the present wrong, but to introduce to your attention an extract from my No. 357 to the Taotai, of October 14, 1880, in answer to his complaint (made verbally), which will open the whole subject. (See inclosure marked A.)

In facilitating the "chartering of junks" and the shipment of cargo on the river, the method of procedure has been as follows: I required from the charterer to be deposited in the consulate the original charter-party, in Chinese and English, of every junk it was proposed to load. This I required as an equivalent for the "deposit of a ship's papers." I then gave a letter to the foreign customs, a form of which is inclosed, marked B. The charterer on presentation of this letter was permitted to ship his freight, and when this was completed he applied to me for a "clearance," (see inclosure marked C.)

He then obtained from the foreign customs (1) a river pass and arms certificate, (2) a cargo certificate in English and Chinese, (3) a duty-paid receipt and a tonnage-dues receipt on one document, and (4) a bond certificate. With these papers the junk was protected on her entire voyage (usually made from Hankow to Ching-Kiang) and was free from interruption by the various lekin and customs stations passed, except for the examination of the papers. In this respect the chartered junks were on an exact footing with lorchas and steamers doing similar business, as the treaties undoubtedly intended they should be. But if a junk lacked any one of the documents above noted, she was detained at any station where the omission was discovered until she could procure it, and was liable to be turned back to the port of departure. This method has been in unquestioned operation under the "regulations for trade on the Yangtsze" continuously since January 1, 1863, when the foreign customs were first established here.

On the 29th November, 1880, Mr. Jenkins applied to one of the native junk shipping hongs through whom all charter parties are made, to charter a junk, as he had done for years. He was told they could not charter a junk, that the hongs had been summoned before the subprefect, acting under the Taotai, and made to give written assent to a notification read to them, that hereafter the junk owners would be required to pay what is known as "port dues" at the stations along the route, whenever a junk was chartered by a foreigner, and that they would be held responsible for all dues known as "lekin" at all stations passed on all cargo found on board, although it had paid duty according to the foreign tariff at the "foreign customs," and they would further be liable to punishment for attempting to smuggle.

On the 6th of December, 1880, there was posted on the city walls a "proclamation," which is inclosed with its translation, marked D^1 and D^2, and you will notice that it substantially supports the statements of the junk owners, for although the payment of "boat dues" by the owners is specifically mentioned, yet that payment to the native customs takes the vessel out from under the jurisdiction of the foreign customs, makes the vessel purely a native craft, and therefore subjects her cargo to whatever exactions the multiplied lekin stations along her route may choose to impose. Whether such exactions (never determinate) were little or much, or whether the "boat dues" were exorbitant or otherwise at the various stations, the conditions utterly preclude the chartering of a junk by a foreigner, first, because the junk owner can never know what the exactions from him may be on either boat or cargo, and, second, because he is strictly forbidden to allow the foreigner to pay them, either by advancing the price of the charter or by an agreement to refund whatever amount may be paid en route.

On the 8th December Mr. Jenkins was informed by the clerk in charge of the export and clearance desk at the foreign customs that they would not in future receive from him "tonnage dues" on chartered junks, but he must bring to them instead a "port dues" receipt from the native customs; that it would not be considered a customs document to take the place of the tonnage-dues receipt, nor be noted on the papers, as it was not paid to the customs. Mr. Jenkins replied that as a foreigner he could not recognize any but foreign customs in his shipping business, nor be required to hunt up native officials. He asked to see and to have delivered to him a copy of the order, which was refused him, as the order was not in writing nor posted, as all similar notifications have invariably been, but was only a verbal instruction from the commissioner to the clerk, but no junk clearance from the customs would be given him except the native receipt for port dues was produced first.

For some inexplicable reason no notice whatever was communicated to the consul of so important a change either from the foreign customs or from native authorities. I knew of the "proclamation," and sent my scribe into the street to copy it, whence my transcript of it. After waiting more than two weeks thereafter for official information and receiving none, I wrote my No. 364, of December 19, to the commissioner. (See inclosure E.) The same day I received his reply (marked F) and answered it (inclosure G). To my No. 365 the commissioner made no response, leaving me to the unavoidable inference that no real interference with established custom was contemplated; but I must be allowed to say Mr. White's response is not the full and candid information I asked for, and the conclusions I drew from it are utterly misleading. While they are warranted by the letter itself, the facts deny them all. Whether it was intended to be sophistical and to evade the facts I wished to have from authority I will not judge, but I wrote my No. 365 expressly to show him the legitimate conclusions from his communication, and to give him the opportunity to correct any erroneous inference. He has never replied, even to acknowledge receipt of my last dispatch, although I know he received it. I will not comment on his silence farther than to observe that in six years' experience in China it is the first instance in which full information has been withheld from me on any official topic where information was asked for from officials of any nationality.

I regret, if Mr. White has done so, that any foreigner in Chinese service should at all imitate the native character for official prevarication. He certainly knew what the actual as well as the nominal effect was, and what was intended to be compassed by it. The secrecy and silence of the whole movement is suggestive, to say the least. I doubt if Mr. Inspector-General Hart gave it his sanction or co-operation. Soon after the correspondence with the commissioner, the Tao'tai condescended to give me information of the abrupt change that had been in operation nearly a month. On December 25, 1880, I received his dispatch marked H[1]. I do not pretend to explain the long delay. But you will observe that both this communication and the proclamation carefully exclude or suppress the correspondence referred to with the acting British minister in 1877, which does not support their action. Two days later, on the 27th December, I received the Ichang Taotai's communication, marked I[1], which covers the portion of the correspondence above noted.

If all the treaties do not specify both the rate and the duration of dues for the tonnage of all vessels, the French treaty certainly does, and the twenty-third article of the Prussian treaty most especially so. These have heretofore been inviolate, and I am at a loss to understand why the treaties should define rates and the Yangtsze rules prescribe different ones for a certain class of vessels. May it not be that the phraseology of the sixth rule, viz, "Will pay port dues according to Chinese tariff," refers to the different method of measuring employed for the native junks? At all events the language does not require payment to be made at native customs, but only at a native rate. The real object of the violent change, however, is to give license to the native officials to make exactions from both vessel and cargo at all stations on the route of traffic.

I respectfully submit the following topics for consideration as entering into the decision of the matter at issue, and ask your excellency's attention to the whole subject, with a view of securing justice and a proper interpretation of the treaties by which a reversal may be effected of the wrongful and injurious change.

1st. The treaties give the full right to traffic on the Chinese waters and rivers and between the open ports.

2d. They guarantee protection to foreigners through the foreign customs for trade in vessels, whether under steam or sail, large or small.

3d. They make no discrimination to the prejudice of small vessels, whether owned or chartered by foreigners.

4th. They affix the rates of tonnage dues, and they should be uniform in system.

5th. A foreigner cannot be compelled to have business with native customs where foreign customs are established.

6th. Monopolies are strictly prohibited in trade or in vessels.

7th. Any onerous or peculiar exaction on small or native owned craft under charter to foreigners, acts as a monopoly, as it prohibits competition, and diverts and forces all freights towards steamers, the principal lines being in native hands.

8th. The assent to the principle that merchandise shipped by foreigners through foreign customs having paid prescribed tariffs may thereafter be subject to lekin in process of a voyage, would be an entering wedge to end in subjecting goods on all kinds of craft to the same exactions.

9th. The direct result of the last-suggested claim would be to drive all foreign shipping from Chinese waters, and establish such exactions upon merchandise as to render trade in foreign commodities impossible.

10th. If the "Yangtsze regulations" afford any warrant for the interpretation and action now developed by the "proclamation" they should be at once modified, and made to conform to the treaties in letter and in spirit also.

I have no doubt you will give the matter such earnest and immediate attention as its importance demands. I presume co-operation with other nationalities will be desirable. Shipping goods in chartered junks has long been an important branch of business in American hands at this port, and has been conducted in an honorable and justified way. If others have abused the privileges granted to foreigners it affords no sufficient reason for illegitimate ways of curbing the evil. The treaties provide remedies for such abuses. Probably one-third of the fees received at this consulate are derived from the entrances and clearances of such junks, aggregating about $500 per annum. The action taken totally suppresses revenue from this source, besides being a severe and decisive blow at a legitimate business of American citizens. This is a small matter, however, as compared with the ultimate effect upon general commerce, upon trade privileges, and upon treaty rights. I trust you may be able to obtain a speedy revocation of the obnoxious proceedings, apparently by sanction of the foreign board, but, I cannot doubt, without the knowledge or consent of our own or other legations at Peking.

I am, &c.,

ISAAC F. SHEPARD.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 120.]

A PROCLAMATION,

Issued by the Wu Chang Prefect.

I am in receipt from Hoo Taotai, of Hankow, as follows:

I have to inform you that I have received the following from his excellency the viceroy, on the 10th November:

I am in receipt, on the 6th November, 1880, of a dispatch from the Tsung-li Yamên, as follows:

The Yamên is in receipt of a communication from the northern and southern superintendents of trade (Nanking, viceroy, and Tientsin, viceroy), as follows:

We have a petition from the Kinkiang Taotai, as follows:

There is at present a custom among the native traders of fraudulently obtaining a permit from a foreign trader, and using it to cover a junk flying the foreigner's flag [i. e., protected by the foreigner's name]. They thus hire a native vessel, on which they place their wood or timber, and pay only one duty at the foreign customs at Hankow, and thus pass the Kinkiang customs without further charge. Thus these junks pass all stations along the route free of boat dues. Your petitioner would request that in future all junks chartered by foreigners be required to pay their junk dues, according to the sixth article of "revised regulations of trade on the Yang-tsze kiang," which is that junk dues are to be paid according to the native tariff, and thus crafty merchants will have no room to exercise their sharp practice, and the revenue will be greatly increased.

The foregoing being received by the superintendents of trade, they replied, "We will instruct the Hankow Taotai to furnish information."

The board having received the above would observe:

We find Rule VI of Yangtsze rules of trade to be, that junks which are chartered by foreigners to carry goods, are on their entry at a customs to pay junk duty according to native rules (or tariff). This is the regulation for foreigners chartering junks. All the customs are to carry out this rule. During the third year, forth moon (May, 1877), an Englishman on board a native vessel belonging to the Kuang province, on passing Wuhu, paid the native junk duty at that place. We arranged with Foo, the acting British minister, that the native vessels should pay native junk dues. We farther requested the minister to instruct the consuls to issue the needed orders to the traders, that the payment of the boat duty belongs to the native boat owners, and does not concern foreign traders; and that foreigners must not allow the boatmen to impose on them to pay what does not concern them. By acting thus both parties interested will be benefited. We hand to you, the viceroy, copies of the correspondence, so you can issue the proper instructions to the native and foreign customs, that junks chartered in future will pay their dues at the native customs according to native rules, and that the foreign customs are not to collect boat duty. Thus the junk owners will have no excuse nor chance to practice craftiness. The use of foreign flags by natives to run by the stations for the purpose of defrauding the revenue is a very heinous practice, and greatly detrimental to the revenue, and strict measures should be taken to suppress it. The English and French treaties contain clauses against such practices. The consuls interested on being informed would do their duty towards putting a stop to them. Should the taotai find that natives are using foreign flags, he should bring it to the notice of the consuls, so they may prevent it, and thus the fraud may be stopped, and the revenue protected. The board request you to issue the proper orders. This is an important matter. I, the viceroy, now issue to you, the taotai, this order for your action. You will inform me of your plan to carry out these instructions. I, the taotai, having received the above and having also received a communication from the northern superintendent of trade to the same effect, have issued the proposed order to the commissioner of customs, the deputy at the head custom-house, known as the foreign customs. I now have to instruct you, the Wu Chang prefect, that in future when junks are chartered by foreigners, my office will not collect the boat duty. You are therefore to order the boat owners to pay their boat dues themselves, according to the native rules. You are also to give notice to all customs stations under your control.

I, the prefect, now issue this proclamation to all of you boat hongs, boat-owners, and traders, that hereafter when junks are chartered to foreigners, you, the junk-owners, are to come and pay the boat-duty at the different boat-dues stations, according to native regulations. This order is issued in accordance with Article VI of the "Yangtsze regulations for trade." I am instructed by the taotai that the foreign customs will not collect "boat-duty," but the native customs will collect it. Therefore you junk-owners are, in future, to pay your boat-duty at different Wu Chang stations. You are not allowed to use foreign flags for your private use to run by customs stations, and thus evade the payment of dues. All who do not obey will be severely punished. Important notice.

Dated December 6, 1880.

NOTE BY THE CONSUL.—The foreign flags referred to in the foregoing are simply and only the house flag, or designation of the foreign charterer of the junks. Every clearance that has been given has on it, in prominent type, the words, "The United States flag is not to be raised on the junk," and the prohibition has not been violated.

No. 152.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

No. 126.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, March 26, 1881. (Received May 16.)

SIR: The news of the assassination of the Emperor of Russia reached Peking on the 23d instant.

I called at once on Mr. Koyander, the Russian secretary, now in charge of the legation, to express my sympathy. In view of the very cordial relations which have so long existed between the United States and Russia, I deemed it fitting to address to Mr. Koyander the note a copy of which I inclose. I also forward a copy of the reply of Mr. Koyander (in French), and a translation of it.

On the 24th instant, at 1.30 p. m., the diplomatic body, by invitation of Mr. Koyander, attended a funeral service in the chapel of the Russian legation. The service was conducted by the archimandrite resident at Peking. The foreign ministers here have agreed to keep their flags at half-mast for ten days to give public expression to their sympathy with Russia.

I have, &c.,

Mr. Angell to Mr. Koyander.

PEKING, March 24, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I need not say how shocked I was in common with all my colleagues, in hearing last evening of the assassination of His Imperial Majesty Alexander II. I can assure you even before I hear from home, that the news has caused profound sorrow throughout the length and breadth of my country. For although the relations of Russia and the United States have always been most cordial, they have been especially so during the reign of the late Emperor. Three events have contributed to this: First. Our admiration and sympathy were awakened by that great and courageous act, the emancipation of the serfs, which was followed two years later by the similar act of the emancipation of the slaves in the United States. Secondly. His Imperial Majesty proved himself one of the best friends we had in Europe during the terrible days of our civil war. His noble attitude at that time won for him the deep and imperishable affection and gratitude of my countrymen. Thirdly. The negotiations of the two countries concerning the transfer of Alaska were conducted in a spirit which was most amicable and hearty.

Certain European writers have speculated not a little on the causes of the firm friendship between the great empire of the east and the great republic of the west. But whatever the cause, the fact is one in which my countrymen rejoice, and therefore the grief in the United States at the deep affliction which has come upon Russia will be universal and profound.

I have felt that I should hardly be true to my duty as a representative of the Government and people of the United States, if I did not indicate to you, however inadequately, their sincere sorrow and sympathy in this sad hour.

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

LEGATION OF RUSSIA IN CHINA,
Peking, March 13, (25), 1881.

DEAR SIR: I hasten to communicate to your excellency my warmest thanks for the letter, full of cordiality and sympathy, which you were pleased to address to me yesterday on receiving the terrible news of the death of His Majesty the Emperor Alexander II, the beloved sovereign of my country. I do not doubt that the hateful crime which has been committed in St. Petersburg, will awaken everywhere deep indignation, but especially in the United States, whose government and whose people, as you say with so much justice, have always been bound by ties of sincere sympathy and friendship to the Empire of Russia. I remember still the painful and sad emotion which was produced among my countrymen by the news of the tragic and premature death of President Lincoln, that great citizen of the republic who fell contending for the glory and the greatness of his country. Russia has just been smitten with a similar misfortune in the person of her beloved sovereign. In the midst of our national grief, the expressions of sympathy by foreign nations will certainly be appreciated at their true value by my countrymen, and will greatly contribute to strengthen the bonds of friendship which unite Russia to other countries, and more especially to the great Republic of the United States.

Filled with gratitude for the sentiments which you have been pleased to express in your letter, I beg you to receive the assurance of my high consideration, and to believe me,

Yours, &c.,

A. KOYANDER.

His Excellency Mr. JAMES B. ANGELL,
Minister of the United States, &c., &c., &c., Peking.

No. 153.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Angell.

No. 82.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 4, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatch marked "confidential," No. 103, of January 25, 1881, inclosing a confidential memorandum from the Japanese minister at Peking, has been received. Ordinarily it would be unnecessary to do more than acknowledge the receipt of the interesting and not unimportant information which you have properly communicated to the Department.

But, both in his conversation with you and in the memorandum itself, the Japanese minister seems to rest the propriety of this official communication upon the fact that the negotiations between the Governments of Japan and China, to which it refers, were initiated by the advice and at the suggestion of "ex-President Grant."

It is scarcely necessary for me to say that this Department joins with the people of the United States in grateful appreciation of the eminent services which that distinguished man has rendered to his country, and that it was profoundly gratifying to the government to know that he was everywhere in his recent journey received with the most honorable consideration, and that the rulers of other countries sought his advice and obtained the benefit of his judgment and experience. But it must be recollected that General Grant traveled simply as a citizen of the United States without representative character or official responsibility, and any advice which he may have deemed it judicious to give was the expression of his individual opinion, and did not authoritatively indicate the policy or sentiment of the Government of the United States. It might be a source of future embarrassment if foreign statesmen unfamiliar with our political habits and institutions should misapprehend the value and consequence of such a relation. In the question of the negotiation to which the Japanese minister refers, if either China or Japan, or both of them, had asked the good offices of this government the expectation would have been natural that the United States would watch such negotiations with interest and interpose their friendly advice to prevent or relieve any unforeseen misunderstanding in their progress.

Having no official connection with the subject, and our relations with both the powers interested being delicate and important, it is scarcely proper that we should be the recipient of the official complaint of either, although that complaint be made in a confidential manner. As the impression which you describe as being made on yourself will suggest, it would have been better to receive no formal communication from either unless such communication had been volunteered by both. If the Japanese Government desired to make such a representation alone, I would prefer that it should have been made directly to this Department through the Japanese minister here. While, therefore, I do not mean to express any dissatisfaction at your having forwarded this communication, I would have been glad if it had occurred to you to call the attention of the Japanese minister to the fact that such a communication was somewhat informal, and could not, with propriety, be made the subject of consideration by this government. You say further:

Mr. Shishido desired my opinion concerning his course in the negotiations, and especially concerning his departure. I told him that I could not venture to say anything touching the main questions under consideration by China and Japan, but that as-surely if, in the recent negotiations of our commission, the Chinese commissioners had refused to sign our treaties after they had agreed to sign them, I should have withdrawn from the capital.

If I could consider this simply as a confidential conversation with your colleague in which he has been anxious to get, and you have been willing to give, your individual opinion as to the line of conduct which he proposed to pursue, it might pass without comment, as perhaps you are the only judge of how far your personal relation with your colleague authorized him to impose and you to accept the very delicate responsibility of advising him. But the expression of the decided opinion recorded in the above extract from your dispatch renders necessary a word of caution.

If the unfortunate condition, which you suppose had occurred and your colleagues on the commission and yourself had unanimously agreed upon the propriety of withdrawing from the capital, this Department would have given due consideration to the convictions of such able and faithful ministers, but still I would have regarded your resolution of such grave import that it ought not to have been adopted without immediate reference for further instructions from this Department. A suspension of negotiation, indeed of communication, would have been justified while so waiting, but it could only be in an extreme case of urgent danger to the honor and interests of his country that a minister would be justified without positive instruction in making a demonstration which would so seriously commit his government.

You will, I trust, understand that no censure of your conduct is intended to be conveyed by these comments upon your dispatch. But the relations between China and Japan and our own relations with both powers are such that we are bound to maintain in reference to their affairs the most honorable and scrupulous impartiality. Should the termination of the negotiations to which you refer threaten to disturb their friendly relations, it would only be such impartial interest in their welfare which would enable us to use any influence we might possess to restore the amicable feeling which it is our earnest desire should exist between them.

I am, sir, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Evarts.

No. 134.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 9, 1881. (Received June 13.)

SIR: I forward you herewith two very interesting papers on the subject of railways in China.

The first is a memorial of General Lin-Ming Ch'uan to the Empress Dowager and the Emperor, recommending the construction of railways, for excellent reasons, which he sets forth very clearly. This general has for many years been conspicuous for his valuable military services, and is on terms of special intimacy with Li Hung Chang. It is not improbable that the memorial was inspired by the viceroy. I think it was presented early in the winter. It is understood that one of the censors reported stoutly against the memorial, and that consequently it was received at first by their majesties with disfavor.

Soon after, however, it was referred to the northern and southern superintendents of trade, Li Hung Chang and Liu Kun Yi (of Nanking), for consideration, and the second paper inclosed is their report. I think you will find it a very lucid and cogent document. Probably no Chinese paper has ever before set out so forcibly the advantages which the introduction of a system of railways would bring to this Empire. I have reason to believe that for a time this winter Li Hung Chang was very hopeful that the general plan would be approved, and a line from Ching-Kiang to Peking would soon be begun. But the Emperor has decided that no action shall be taken at present. I am inclined to believe that railways will be built only under the pressure of some great military exigency. But they will come sooner or later.

I have, &c.

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 134.]

Memorial of Lin-Ming Ch'uan, a general in the Chinese army, in retirement, recommending the immediate introduction of railways as a means of augmenting the power of the country.

Your Majesties' slave, Lin-Ming Ch'uan, &c., &c., upon his knees addresses the Throne: Looking upward, he implores the glances of Your Sacred Majesties upon a memorial, reverently prepared, showing that as the situation of the Empire is daily becoming more critical, and as difficulties from without are pressing harder upon us day by day, immediate consideration should be given to the question of introducing railways as a means whereby to augment the power of the Empire.

Your slave's merits sink into insignificance when compared with the abundant favors which have been bestowed upon him since his withdrawal from the army, in consequence of illness. Your slave, in the retirement of his garden home, has always studied the relations between China and foreign countries, with the result that he has often been awaked and brought to his feet in the hours of night to find his eyes streaming with tears from anxiety. He feels mortified at the thought that all his dog or horse-like* exertions are inadequate to repay one ten-thousandth part of the favors which he has received.

Recently he had the honor to be summoned by Your Majesties, and in contempt of his sickness came to the capital. On his arrival he was further honored by being summoned into the Imperial presence, when he received full and complete instructions, his gratitude and respect for which your slave cannot find words to express.

Your slave conceives it to be the duty of an officer towards his sovereign to speak when he learns anything that should be known to his master, and, acting on this principle, he feels it his duty, with all diligence, respectfully to submit to Your Imperial Majesties, the Empress Dowager and the Emperor, that the introduction of changes are matters which are attended with the gravest embarrassments, and the adoption of measures which may result in benefit or in injury to the country are considerations of the gravest importance.

The troubles which have beset China since she removed the bolts and opened her doors to engage in trade with foreign countries are by far more numerous and embarrassing than anything she has had to meet from her enemies since the earliest ages. These foreigners, in their dealings with us, are ever ready, on the smallest pretext, to create a dispute whereby they may deceive and oppress us, and when there is a quarrel between any one of them and ourselves, the others press around and eagerly watch for an opportunity.

Russia's southern frontier (in Asia) is very extensive; so much so that it is contiguous to and interlocked with our northern, eastern, and western frontiers; we feel her grip on our throat, and her fist upon our back, and our contact with her is a source of perpetual uneasiness to our hearts and minds. But our long season of weakness and inaction disables us from making a show of strength, and our only alternative, therefore, is to patiently bear insult and obloquy. When a quarrel occurs we have to yield to her demands and make a compromise, regardless of money, in order to avert the dangers of war.

* A mode of expression designed to humble one's self when speaking of favors received. (The dog can watch its master's house, and the horse can draw or carry burdens for him.)

It must be remembered, however, that a long enduring peace between two countries is a thing that cannot be relied upon as a certainty, and that the wealth of a nation is not unbounded. If we make no departure from our present conservatism, what strength can we hope to acquire?

There are those who speak thoughtlessly of going to war. In this connection your slave would beg to observe that the essential point before going to war is to ascertain the condition of the enemy's forces. Russia has built railways which run from Europe to the neighborhood of Hao Han, and she purposes to build one from Hai-Shenweei to Hui Ch'un, and the reason why she did not proceed to send troops recently, when the quarrel with us commenced, is not that she feared to encounter our soldiers, but that her railways were not quite completed. Your slave foresees that, before ten years are passed, some immeasurable disaster may be looked for from that quarter.

Now, Japan is an extremely small country—like a pill. Her rulers, however, have adopted western mechanical arts; and relying on her possession of railways, she attempts now and again to be arrogant—like a mantis when it assumes an air of defiance—and to despise China, and gives us no small amount of trouble on the smallest pretext.

Your slave is much grieved and distressed when he thinks that if the present time is allowed to go past without measures being taken to strengthen our country, how vain it will be to repent when it is too late.

Although it is true that the proper way to proceed to strengthen our country is by drilling troops and manufacturing arms, &c., regularly in their turn, yet it must be confessed that the immediate construction of railways will be the mainspring of our country's strength.

It would be difficult to enumerate all the advantages that will be derived from the possession of railways; such, for instance, as facilitating the transportation of the grain-tax, affording prompt and effective communication in the distribution of relief, the extension of commerce, the furtherance of mining operations, the suppression of lekin stations, and the improved system of traveling. But the principal advantage that will be derived from them is the more effective method of transporting troops, and this consideration renders it important that their introduction should not be delayed.

The area of China's territory is very great. Her northern frontier stretches out to a length of 10,000 li, and is conterminous to the confines of Russia; moreover, there are foreigners of many nationalities resident at the treaty ports, who are engaged in trade with our people. To draw a line on our frontier and guard it against invasion is a matter which, in spite of our desire, we are unable to do. "Although we ride about on a fleet horse, and do not spare the whip, we are unable to come up in time."* If railways are built all parts of the country, north, south, east, and west, will be within easy communication, and in case of war we can form our plans according to our observations of the enemy's movements. It will be easy to come to a given point in a few days, although the distance be 10,000 li, and a million troops can be brought together at one call; and such irregularities as confusion and hurry when troops are ordered to move and obstructions and delays in the transport of materials and supplies, and similar vexatious embarrassments will be removed. The strength of an army consists in its troops being united, and a state of division means weakness.

China numbers eighteen provinces; her troops are not few, nor are her supplies insufficient; but the troops and supplies of each province are under the control of its high provincial officers. The affairs of each province being thus confined to its own limits, the result is the division of interests that should be united in one mutual and common concern. In case of war each province has barely time to concert its own plans, and when called upon to furnish troops or supplies has not the means wherewith to meet the demand. They are unable, moreover, to come forward with the necessary relief in times of adversity, although an edict be issued from the Throne visiting the responsible officers with severe punishment. With the construction of railways the power of the country will be concentrated, its arteries will flow unobstructed, the number of soldiers may be diminished, supplies curtailed, and several regiments converted into one effective corps. In the protection of our frontiers and seaboard, the necessary materials, such as artillery, &c., can be transported with surpassing rapidity [literally between the dawn and twilight]. Troops garrisoned at different stations can be converted into an effective active battalion, and the strength of the eighteen provinces will be brought into one center. One soldier may be made as efficient as ten. Hereafter the army and commissariat will be under the control of the central government, which will become the seat of importance, while the provincial administration will remain auxiliary and secondary, and the efficiency of the army will not be exposed to be impaired and obstructed by the failures of provincial officers.

* Metaphor for "Our movements are too slow to guard the vast extent of our country."

In the present state of our affairs the expenditure required for the defenses of our frontiers makes a sensible diminution in the revenue of the country, the prosperity of the people is fettered by the lekin excise, the wealth of the country is being monopolized by foreign merchants, and the riches of the land are daily diminishing. There are signs portending some great calamity. But if railways are constructed the profits to be derived from their working will suffice for the maintenance of troops. Some of the lekin stations may be abolished after due consideration, and the worries caused by complaints of foreign merchants regarding transit passes, &c., will be avoided. It would be difficult to devise any other plan more eminently calculated to benefit the prosperity of the country and to further the happiness of the people.

The reasons why Russia is overbearing in her relations with us, and why Japan underrates us are to be found in the fact that China has only one corner of her vast possessions protected, is afraid to face difficulties, and is incapable of rousing her energies, because possessed of an inordinately pacific disposition. But the day when an imperial edict is issued sanctioning the construction of railways it will be manifesting our desire to strengthen ourselves, and the life and energy of our country will instantly be roused. This intelligence will startle those countries, and, while in the first place, we shall find it easier to agree to the terms of a treaty with Russia, on the other hand the insidious designs of Japan will insensibly disappear.

Some time in the current year, the viceroy, Li Hung Chang, memorialized the Throne praying for the sanction of a telegraph line to be laid along the coast. Telegraphs are one of the essential requirements in the operations of an army, and if constructed as auxiliaries to, and in conjunction with railways, there will be a large saving in expense as well as increased facility of supervision. If any difficulty be encountered in raising the requisite funds for the construction of railways, and doubts arise as to our inability to proceed with the work, your slave thinks that the plan of inviting contributions from the mercantile classes is not unworthy of consideration, but if this plan be unfeasible in consequence of the wide dispersion of these classes, the contraction of a foreign loan is the only plan worthy to be considered, if there exists a desire to avail of the present time for the construction of railways.

If the contraction of a foreign loan in aid of the government be held to be an impossibility, a loan for this purpose may be considered an exception. It is a means whereby a source of profit may be opened up, and the money expended will be represented in the materials and plant. These are considerations which will induce the foreign banker to gladly accommodate us with the loan.

The government will have no difficulty in repaying the debt. As the interest asked will be small and the time for repayment ample, it may be liquidated with the profit of the undertaking. The mechanics of the west are expert in manufacturing railways, and are moreover eager for an opportunity of displaying their skill in our Celestial country. Your slave believes the present occasion is especially opportune and one that should not be missed.

Two lines of railways are urgently needed in China. One to go from Ching Kiang through the provinces of Shantung and Chihli, having its terminus at Peking; the other to go from Hankow through Honan to Peking. There should be besides this, two northern routes, one from Peking running eastward to Shengking, the other running westward to Kanhsu. But as it will be difficult to undertake all these lines at once in consequence of the enormous outlay that will be required, your slave would suggest and prays that sanction be given for the construction, first, of the line from Chin Kiang to Peking, to be in connection with the line of telegraph which it is proposed to lay this year. As the provinces of Shantung and Chihli cover a large tract of territory through which this railroad will have to pass, and as stories are likely to be current about its interference with the family graves and homes of the people, much opposition to it must be expected from those who are ignorant that the government roads are broad, and that the space required for the permanent way will be little more than 10 feet, and that the railway will in no way interfere with their homes and graveyards; but if obstacles do present themselves in the way of the line, it will be easy to avoid them by a slight detour.

Your slave, while engaged in extirpating the rebels in former years, traveled all through the empire, and has frequently traversed the provinces in question. He is therefore perfectly familiar with the condition of the country, and the circumstanses of the inhabitants; he would not dare to be careless or reckless in forming his opinions so positively.

Should this business, which so closely concerns the efficiency of the army, and is so intimately connected with the weal or woe of the empire, be honored with the sanction of Your Majesties, your slave would pray that an edict be issued instructing the board of foreign affairs to take the matter into immediate consideration and to memorialize in reply. If, however, indecision and procrastination prevail, and the business be regarded as a thing that can be put off to a future day, it is much to be feared that after the treaty with Russia is signed, the construction of railways will be indefinitely postponed, like the case of the "man who wanting to build a house, concerts his plans with passers in the street,"* and also that the lesson taught in ancient history by "sleeping on straw and tasting the bitter gall"† will become a vain waste of words, and that the day will never come when an effort to strengthen our country will be made.

Your slave has written out the reasons which have prompted him to make this request for the introduction of railways as a means of augmenting the power of the country in a memorial, reverently prepared, which he now submits to the Throne. Prostrate, he prays Your Majesties, the Empress Dowager, and the Emperor, to cast your sacred glances thereon, and to announce your pleasure regarding the feasibility or otherwise of the recommendations set forth therein.

Memorial of Li-Hung-Chang and Lin K'un Yi, northern and southern superintendents of trade, supporting and supplementing Lin Ming Ch'uan's memorial on the introduction of railways.

Your Majesty's servants, Li Hung Chang, northern superintendent of trade, and Lin K'un Yi, southern superintendent of trade, upon their knees address the Throne: Looking upward they implore the sacred glances of Your Majesties upon a memorial reverently prepared, showing that in obedience to an imperial rescript, a satisfactory consultation has been held upon the subject of railways, and that as their construction is a question of the foremost importance in augmenting the power of the country and promoting its prosperity, measures should be immediately devised whereby to raise the necessary funds for their construction, and steps taken in the first place to appoint a competent person to make a careful study of the subject.

Your servants would humbly state that they had the honor to receive from the grand council who had privately communicated to them the Imperial Edict of December 3, as follows:

"Whereas Lin Ming Ch'uan has memorialized Us regarding the formation of railways, and has recommended that steps be taken for the construction first of a line from Chin Kiang to Peking, to be in connection with the line of telegraph which Li Hung Chang has asked for permission to establish this year, the purport of the memorial being to recommend the adoption of measures whereby to augment the power of the country.

"Let Li Hung Chang and Lin Kun Yi carefully consider the proposals set forth therein, and let them memorialize the result of their deliberations.

"Let a copy of Lin Ming Ch'uan's memorial be made and forwarded to them.

"Respect this!"

Looking upward your servants behold with unspeakable respect and submission their sacred Master's anxiety concerning the present troubles, and his untiring endeavors to devise plans for rousing the energies of the country, and incessant efforts to obtain information on every side.

Prostrate, your servants beg to make the following observations:

In the earliest ages, when mankind were first created, the nine divisions of China were subdivided into some ten thousand different states, each of which had its own habits and customs. Although within a few hundred li of each other, they were divided and had no intercourse with each other. When the sages came into existence, men learned to scoop out logs of wood and convert them into canoes; wood was hewed into paddles, and with the aid of these paddles and canoes they crossed over to places which were before inaccessible; oxen were yoked to carts and horses were mounted; heavy burdens were dragged to great distances, and thus all parts of the world became benefited. It is over 4,000 years from that time to the present, and all parts of the country, north, south, east, and west have the same doctrine and the same literature; a condition of things that may rightly be styled flourishing.

The nations of the west have always studied the arts with minute care, and they all manufacture steamboats and railways. Although the earth is about 90,000 li in circumference, they are able to surmount all obstacles and travel through almost every part of it. They have superseded the boats and chariots bequeathed to us by the old sages, by putting forth new ideas and producing inventions which appear to be heaven-sent for the benefit of mankind.

* i. e. Does not make up his mind and go to work seriously.

† An allegory drawn from ancient Chinese history, in which the ruler of a certain state being overcome by his enemies, slept on straw and tasted the bitter gall to inure himself to hardship, and to foster resentment and a determination for strength to be revenged, which he was eventually enabled to accomplish by vanquishing his victors.

In these latter years China has derived no small amount of benefit by imitating western nations and building steamboats. The human intellect becomes enlightened after it has been obscure. Rough materials are transformed into utensils for use. Communities get united after being divided. These are the natural results of the laws of nature, and it is neither wisdom nor force that can restrain them.

Railways first had their origin in England in the working of coal mines. In the first year of the reign of Taokwang the tracks, which were to keep the wheels of the cars in control, were first laid down, and from that time the invention gradually improved. They were used in transporting coal and iron to the markets for sale, and the profits realized were very great. Their use was subsequently extended to every branch of industry and trade, and England came to be the champion of Europe; France, America, Russia, Germany, and other great nations then followed suit and built railways, and it was only after they possessed them that they were enabled to encroach upon and usurp the land of their neighbors and open up and reclaim wild territory. As the populations of these countries increased, and trade flourished, they had to extend their railways in order to meet the improved circumstances of the times. From that time the two continents of Europe and America became accessible from all points of the compass, as each had constructed some hundred thousand li of railroads. Troops ordered to a given point reach their destination in a day, and news and tidings travel with the rapidity of wind.

The daily increase in prosperity and strength that has marked the progress of these nations throughout the last forty or fifty years may be ascribed to the fact that they possess steamers that plow through the sea, and railways that make traveling by land exceedingly convenient.

Now, to speak of Japan, she is a small, insignificant country, yet she possesses railways that run across the whole of her country. Her idea is that by adopting western mechanical improvements she will have it in her power to despise China.

Russia has railways that run from Europe to within a short distance of Haohan, Kiachta, and neighboring places, and she is about to build a line from Hai Shen Wei to Hui Chun. The frontiers of China and Russia are contiguous to each other for some 10,000 li. If we build some railways now while it is time, the present force of our army will be amply sufficient to protect our frontier, but without railways all our endeavors to protect that frontier will be futile, even though we increase our troops and supplies.

China's isolation in being without railways, when all other nations possess them, may be aptly illustrated by supposing those who lived in the middle ages to have discarded the use of the boats and chariots of their time. They could not help being behind other men in all their movements.

Your servants estimate that the advantages to be derived by the possession of railways may be classed under about nine principal divisions:

1st. The country north of the Yangtsze and Hwai Rivers is rather destitute of watercourses, unlike the southern provinces which abound with rivers and streams by which all manner of goods are conveyed in different directions. It is owing to this that out of the 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 taels of revenue derived yearly from foreign goods and lekin, the southern provinces provide about nine-tenths, while the northern provinces figure for one-tenth only. Whereas if railways are gradually built, communication will be established throughout the country like the threads in a loom, commodities can be transported and interchanged between the different provinces according to their respective wants. The idle population of the northern provinces will become industrious; no part of arable land will be allowed to remain unprofitable, nor the energies of man lie dormant, and the condition of the country will gradually become one of affluence. The customary duties and lekin can be levied at the important points of the line so that the revenue derived from these sources will be equally divided between the northern and southern provinces. This is the first advantage that will accrue to the finances of the country.

2d. It is a well-known fact that union in an army means strength, and that weakness is the result of disunion. China's frontier on land and her seaboard are each over 10,000 li in extent. It is not to be supposed that defenses are to be built at every place along this line, for not only will our troops and supplies be insufficient, but this would be a plan without any sense. Railways are wanted to make military operations successful. With their aid distances like those of Yunnan, Kwei Chow, Kanhsu, and Shan hei, can be accomplished in about ten days. The troops garrisoned in the eighteen provinces may be converted into an effective active battalion; hereafter the number of soldiers may be diminished, supplies curtailed, and several regiments converted into one effective corps. The army can be summoned at one signal, its discipline and power will be concentrated, and one soldier made as efficient as ten. This is the second advantage that will result from the possession of railways, in making military operations more successful.

3d. Peking, which may be termed the root of our country, is situated in a lonely position in the north of China, at a great distance from its center, and is very difficult to control, nor can help be afforded in time of trouble. During the war which happened in the tenth year of Hsien Fung's reign, several statesmen of that day advised that the capital be transferred to some more suitable locality, but in view of the gravity of the step it was deemed undesirable to act percipitately on that advice. Moreover, every time a quarrel occurs between foreign nations and ourselves they menace to shatter our capital. If railways are constructed, a distance of 10,000 li may be considered as at one's very threshold, for it can be accomplished in no time, and a hundred million soldiers can be moved to a given place within a few days. All parts of the country will be in a condition of protection and security, the government will be peaceable and unmoved as a rock, and in case of danger assistance will be readily forthcoming. Officials and merchants of every province will be continually traveling to long distances by the railway. Merchandise and government grain will be transported with surprising rapidity. All will be anxious to travel by this route, and to avail themselves of the railway depot for the storage of their goods. In time of peace it cannot fail to prosper trade and to increase the activity of the multitudes. There will be no further necessity to talk of transferring the capital; moreover, the covetous designs of foreign nations will be cut short forever, and the foundation of our country will become immovable for a hundred centuries. In this way our capital city will be protected, which is the third advantage to be gained by the possession of railways.

4th. A few years since, during the disastrous famine that raged in the provinces of Shanksi and Honan, the price of grain in Shanksi rose to the exorbitant rate of over 40 taels per picul. Had there been railways to convey it the price could not have exceeded some 7 taels per picul, including the freight from Tientsin. When the country is in possession of railways, if any calamity by drought or inundation should happen in any of the provinces, relief in the shape of grain or money can be transported as rapidly as light or sound takes to travel, and the lives of many human beings will be spared. Moreover, goods will flow easily to all parts of the country, and the evils of exorbitant prices and engrossing commodities in a market will be avoided. This is the fourth advantage that railways will bring by benefiting and preserving the lives of the people.

5th. Since the transportation of the government grain tax was transferred from the junks to be conveyed over the sea by steamers, several officials have criticised the step, and have ever been anxious that the old custom of conveying it via the Grand Canal should be re-established in order to forestall the unforeseen dangers of the sea. When railways are constructed the transportation of the grain will flow unobstructed like the arteries of the human system, and if on some day the sea road be rendered dangerous by war there need be no anxiety that any obstacle will prevent the whole amount (1,000,000 piculs) of grain from being transported to its destination. Besides this, munitions of war, such as gunpowder, guns, and weapons, and government taxes will all be conveyed without the slightest impediment. This is the benefit that will result to measures of transportation, and is the fifth advantage to be gained by the possession of railways.

6th. The speed of railways is ten times that of the fleetest horse. Henceforth dispatches can be sent with increased rapidity, government orders and missions for purposes of investigation will travel with greater speed than is now possible by the post horses. Exclusive of this, letters and parcels will be conveyed rapidly; soldiers sent in pursuit of robbers and malefactors will reach in a day. Some of the government post stations on the main road might be abolished, and the savings appropriated to the maintenance of the railway. This is the sixth advantage that will result to the postal department of the government.

7th. The coal and iron mines of the empire are all at a distance from the water courses. If railways are used in transporting the products of these mines, the cost price will be small and their sale abundant, and in proportion as the sales increase the mines will prosper and be opened up in large numbers. The expenditure required for constructing the railway will be greatly economized by using the coal and iron of the mines, and the profits that will be derived from their working will be an inexhaustible source of supply for the army. Thus mining operations will be developed and benefited, and this is the seventh advantage that railways will bring.

8th. It is difficult to carry goods to places that are remote from the rivers and canals, as it is difficult to bring native produce thence. With railways merchandise will be conveyed to and from places that are inaccessible to steamers, and traffic will be considerably increased. Thus, steamers and railways will aid each other mutually in transporting goods. This is the eighth advantage that will inure to the carrying trade of the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company.

9th. When railways are introduced, all classes of travelers, whether officials, commoners, merchants, or soldiers, traveling on private or public business, can go to great distances with surpassing speed (lit. 1,000 li in a twinkling). The expenses of the journey will be considerably reduced in view of the rapidity with which one travels, there need be no fear of robbers on the road, and the dangers of wind and wave will be avoided. This is the ninth advantage that railways will create by improving the system of traveling in the empire.

As your servants have shown in the beginning of this memorial, the various nations of the west have suddenly risen in importance because they have all been careful to develop and employ this new invention. It must be remembered, moreover, that the revenue of the state and military tactics are considerations of the foremost importance in planning measures for strengthening the country and promoting its prosperity.

Your Majesties' confirmation of the purport of Lin Ming Ch'uan's memorial, viz, the recommendation of measures that will augment the power of the country, is in reality what is meant when he says that he foresees the advent of some calamity, and the daily increase of our embarrassments, and while expressing his resentment at the injustice of foreign nations towards us desires that the energies of the country be immediately roused by the promulgation first of our intention to introduce railways, and thus cause the insidious designs of Russia and Japan to disappear.

The railroads that are urgently needed in China are, two lines in the south, one to go from Ching Kiang, through the provinces of Shantung and Chihli, reaching Peking; the other from Hankow, through Honan, to Peking; and two northern lines, one running from Peking eastward to Feng-t'ien, the other running westward to Kanhsu. These four routes, if constructed, may be termed the root and stem of the railway enterprise. If branch lines are required to go to places of importance, distant a few hundred li from the main way, your servants believe that they can easily be formed. The distances being short and the necessary expenditure small, contributions can be invited from the merchants, who will be glad to respond to them. Thus the smaller lines will shoot off from the main way like the branches of a tree, so as to form a regular netting, and there need be no anxiety that the railway enterprise will not flourish.

As, however, the construction of these four lines will necessitate an enormous outlay it will be exceedingly difficult to undertake them all at once. The suggestion of Lin Ming-Chuan, that the line from Chin-Kiang to Peking be first built in connection with the line of telegraph which your servant Li Hung-Chang proposed to lay this year is one which, if adopted, will bring two advantages, viz, facility in overseeing the line, and uninterrupted means of sending telegrams. If the construction first of this line be said to be only a partial benefit to the country, considering its condition and requirements, it must be remembered that all the nations of the west were similarly situated fifty years ago, and that it is only owing to their determined efforts to construct them and push to the front, for fear of being behind, that they are able to have the influence which they possess to-day. Lin Ming-Chuan's idea is first to give an example, whereby a start may be made. If the enterprise is pushed on gradually there need be no fear that it will not some day be in a flourishing condition.

If it be argued by some that after railways are constructed it is to be feared that the road will be used by enemies to invade our country, or, again, that as foreigners have long been wishing to build railways in China, if she once makes a commencement it may give these foreigners reason to become exceedingly importunate; it must be said that such objections can only be made by those who are ignorant that every nation uses its railways in transporting troops to defend the country against its enemies. They have never been known to serve the purposes of an enemy. This will be made plain by remembering that the railway is within our territory. Every pass on the frontier being guarded it is not likely that the enemy will find their way through some neglected passage. If, by some extraordinary hazard, a danger like this should happen, one portion of the road can be destroyed and the whole made useless, or if the train be kept out of the enemy's hands the road will be of no value without it. Other nations have had no reason to be anxious on this point since railways were built some scores of years ago. It is a condition that may be likened to the convenience of the man at home, and the disadvantage of the stranger abroad.

By international law and the treaties foreign nations are prohibited to build railroads in the territory of another power without the authority of that power. If we apprehend that they will rely on their superior strength and violate the treaties, and we do not proceed to construct railways ourselves, will our mere apprehension prevent them from presuming on their strength if they desire to do so?

Foreigners are, moreover, constantly advising us how to benefit China. If we proceed of our own motion to adopt measures that will benefit the country by constructing this important line, it will be enough to cut short all further officious advice from them.

Again, if objections be made to the railway on the score of its interference with the welfare of carters and other classes of laborers who it is apprehended will have no way of getting their food and clothing, and that disturbances must inevitably result in consequence of these poor people having lost their means of sustenance; to these objections it must be answered that in England in the early days of the railway there were similar fears that many poor people would be robbed of their means of support; but before long the number of carts and traffic generally in the important towns on the line of the railway became double what it was formerly. Then the railway will be on the main road, and cannot interfere with the villages and little towns in the by-places, which will continue as before to use carts and men to transport goods and passengers. An increase in the railway traffic will necessarily produce a corresponding increase in the number of carts and carriers.

If the railway enterprise reaches a condition of prosperity, it will give work to numbers of men, viz, employés to run the train, laborers to make the roads, guardsmen to watch the line, carriers to load and unload merchandise, and menials to attend on the passengers. The monthly allowances to these men will amply suffice them to support their parents and their families, and if any of them have a little surplus means they might open an inn, and with an increase in their business take partners, and without much effort have a trade with capital and profit. It may, therefore, be reckoned that every 10 or 20 li of railroad will support and afford means of living for not less than some hundred thousand men. Another way in which numbers of men will be employed is in the coal, iron, and other mines, which will be opened in large numbers when railways are constructed. The numbers of poor miners who live by the sweat of their brow will be incalculably increased, which is positive proof of the benefit that will result to all classes of miners.

Finally, some may argue that the railway will interfere with the fields, homes, and graves of the people and that much opposition to it must be expected in consequence. These arguments can only be made in ignorance of the fact that the government roads are broad, and that the permanent way will not require much more than ten feet, and therefore cannot interfere with the fields, homes, and graves of the people. In places where the government road is too narrow, a strip of land can be bought and paid for liberally; and if graves do present themselves in the way of the line, they can easily be avoided by a slight detour. Lin Ming Ch'uan traveled all over the empire while engaged in exterminating the rebels in former years, and is thorough familiar with the condition of the country and the circumstances of the inhabitants.

The introduction of railways, however, being a question of paramount importance, it behooves us to examine the subject very carefully in the first stages of its management to forestall future evils and have a good model by which to go in the long run. Your servants have been careful to gather much information on this subject and find that the railways constructed by foreigners are of various kinds; some are strong and last a good while; others again are less durable and last only some time. Their prices also differ very widely; one li of road may cost a few thousand taels, or it may cost 10,000 taels. As the road from Ching Kiang to Peking is an important highway, the line which it is proposed to build should be a substantial one, so as to last some time. Although it is difficult to estimate in advance what sum will be required, it is certain that it will not be small.

The money at the disposal of the government is very limited at the present time. If the funds required for constructing the railway be called for from the provinces, the provincial officers will not know how to raise the money; or if contribution be invited from merchants, it will be difficult to collect them in consequence of the wide dispersion of these classes. The proposition of Lin Ming Ch'uan that a foreign loan be negotiated is the only feasible plan. China has on former occasions frequently contracted foreign loans, but some officials fearing that each province would make this a precedent for borrowing money and become so far involved as to be at the mercy of foreign creditors, the board of revenue memorialized and the contraction of foreign loans was interdicted. It must be said, however, that a loan for starting a large, profitable undertaking and a loan in aid of the army are two different things. When railways are started the interest on the loan can be easily repaid by the profits of their working, and the government will have gained a lasting source of profit.

But there are three things in the contractions of foreign loans that demand great care.

1st. As it is to be apprehended that the foreign lenders will take the direction of the railway into their own hands and exclude us from being masters in the business, a clause must be made distinctly stating that they may not interfere in the matter. The interest of the money being guaranteed, and the debt being punctually paid up at the specified dates, all matters relating to employing workmen, purchasing materials, and constructing the line, must be left to our management, the foreign creditor being debarred from questioning our actions. If this condition be inadmissible, no foreign loan should be made.

2d. The next fear is that foreigners will strive unlawfully to get the undertaking into their own hands. To prevent this, the regulations of the China Merchants' Steamer Company, which exclude foreigners from becoming shareholders, will have to be followed. When the railway company is formed its management will be in the hands of Chinese merchants, subject, however, to the supervision of some government official. Regulations should be made, after consultation, providing for the repayment of the loan by the said company by installments in different years, till the whole amount, interest and capital, be cleared off. If there should happen to be failures in paying up, the government superintendent will urge payment; the company will only be allowed to mortgage the railway, but not to transfer it into the hands of the foreign creditors

The repayment of the loan being thus clearly provided for by limitation, all malpractices will be cut short. A foreign loan should not be contracted unless the foregoing indispensable condition be complied with.

3d. The third danger is that the finances of the country will have to suffer in consequence of the railway loan. Hitherto when foreign loans have been negotiated, the revenue derived from the maritime customs has always been appropriated to repay them. Recently the customs establishments have been called upon to meet so many demands for money that they are greatly embarrassed. It should be clearly stipulated that the loan will have no connection with the customs revenue. The government will decide in what way the profits to be derived from the railway enterprise will be successively appropriated towards repaying the debt, which will be cleared off at latest within ten or twenty years. No foreign loan should be made without this indispensable condition for the protection of the finances of the state.

The foregoing three provisos are important considerations in negotiating a foreign loan.

Your servants have learned that foreigners have hitherto been very careful in making loans to consider what the chances are of recovering their money. If the conditions set forth above are rigorously adhered to, it is likely they will not be willing to lend; but if they are, then the construction of railways may be proceeded with at once. Instead, however, of proceeding to build them hastily, regardless of evils which a loan on any condition might entail, the business should be deferred to be maturely considered, that there be no reason to repent of errors. Your servants have also learned that none of the railways of other nations have been built without a loan. Their mode of procedure is the following: An engineer of reputation makes a survey of the road, and a prospectus is prepared, clearly showing the estimates of the undertaking and the probabilities of its success, which is a means of amply securing the confidence of the people.

The road from north to south which it is proposed to build in China will, after it has run some time, bring considerable profit. When the public company is formed an engineer of intelligence and reputation should be engaged to make a careful estimate of the undertaking. His estimate will be carefully considered by the Tsung-li Yamên and your servants, who will prepare a satisfactory and reliable prospectus, on which some wealthy foreign merchants might be induced to accommodate us with the loan.

As regards the selecting of materials for constructing the railway, estimating how many li of the road are to be built, hiring laborers economically and at the same time to obtain substantial work, all these are matters that should be carefully investigated, so that the essential parts of the business be not overlooked.

A high official should be specially deputed to superintend the management of this business, which includes inviting shareholders and raising the loan, measuring the land, hiring laborers, etc., etc., and is somewhat intricate. Without this step the business cannot be expected to work satisfactorily. Your servants beg to state that Lin Ming Ch'uan is a man in the full vigor of life and possesses a bold and resolute nature; he has gone through great hardships in the service of his country, and is very desirous to undertake the management of this business since he has seen lately that foreign nations are ill treating us on all sides, and believes that the country's present state of helplessness should be changed for an attitude of strength. The business, however, being an innovation, its management will be difficult and it will require time before we experience its benefits. If any imminent danger were threatening the empire and the court were to order Lin Ming Ch'uan to take a command, the consideration of this affair would naturally have to be postponed, but he is now without any occupation, having solicited leave to nurse his health. Should this proposition be honored with the sanction of their sacred master, and Lin Ming Ch'uan be appointed to superintend the management of the railway company, your servants would pray that he be ordered in the first place to make a careful study of the important points in this business, and without precipitancy to consult and deliberate thereon. Japan and Russia will be startled to hear that, in the midst of all her difficulties, China has still strength left to take this step. It will be manifesting something on which they did not reckon. A truly admirable way of first giving the sound and following it up with the reality. As Lin Ming Ch'uan is now at leisure, he might proceed to invite shareholders and form a company to consider the question of a foreign loan, although it is hard to say whether or not a large sum can be raised, his reputation as a man of loyal merit is more likely to enlist the united assistance of men of all classes, both foreign and native, than any other man.

There are over 10,000 men stationed in the garrisons of Chih-li and Kiangsu, who served under Lin Ming Ch'uan in former years. In his study of the railway question it might appear plain to him that an economical way of proceeding will be to employ the aid of these men in constructing the road, and if the contributions of native merchants be abundant the surplus can be applied to some other purpose. In each case it will be the duty of your servants to consult with him and manage the business according to the shape it may assume. The question of introducing railways having been thus brought before the throne by Lin Ming Ch'uan, its management from first to last should be intrusted to him. If, for any reason, the business be put off ten years, at the end of that time he should still be charged with it; there is no other person on whom he could place the responsibility. Should other and more important calls of duty arise after his appointment he can leave the railway business and, in obedience to the orders of the throne, proceed to his new post of duty.

When railways are built in China she must also open up her coal and iron mines to prevent her treasure from flowing into foreign lands. The coal and iron mines in the neighborhood of Che-chou-fou and Lou-wan-fu, in Shanhsi, are very rich. It is matter of regret that no merchants, with large capital, are to be found to work them. If the capital for constructing railways can be raised, one-tenth of the sum obtained might be employed in working the mines after western methods and with foreign machinery, and the coal and iron obtained might be used for the railway. Thus the mines will be developed and benefited by the railway and will, in turn, help to extend the railway enterprise, and the two undertakings will bring about a highly desirable result.

Your servants forward, with all dispatch, their memorial in reply, reverently prepared, setting forth the considerations relative to railways as a means of augmenting the power of the country, and to the necessity of first making a careful study of the question. Prostrate they submit their reply to the throne, and pray Your Majesties the Empress Dowager, and the Emperor, to cast your sacred glances thereon and to issue your instructions in the premises.

No. 140.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 11, 1881. (Received June 13.)

SIR: I have to announce that on the 8th instant, at 6 p. m., the Empress Dowager, commonly known as the Empress of the East Palace, in distinction from the Empress Dowager of the West Palace, died after an illness of only two days. The legations have, at the time of this writing, received no official announcement of the event. But the Peking Gazette contains two imperial rescripts concerning her death. As the mail leaves at once I cannot now inclose translations of them.

The deceased Empress is the widow of the Emperor Hsien-Fung, who reigned from 1850 to 1861. Having lost his wife just as he ascended the throne, he married the lady just deceased. She bore him no son. In 1856 one of his concubines or second wives bore him a son, who succeeded him as the Emperor Tung-Chih in 1861. At the death of Hsien-Fung, his wife, the woman who has just died, was, of course, the Empress Dowager. But by decree of the new Emperor, Tung-Chih, his mother was also raised to the honor of Empress Dowager. So there have been two Empresses Dowager since 1861. The present Emperor, Kwang-Hsü, who came to the throne in 1874, is the cousin of Tung-Chih and nephew of the surviving Empress Dowager. The two Empresses, it is thought, have played a considerable part in the conduct of affairs. The deceased Empress has been reputed to be of a pacific spirit, and friendly to Prince Kung. The surviving Empress has been thought to take a more active part in shaping the policy of the empire. She has been so ill for months that her death has been daily expected, and several times reported in the streets. But the Empress of the East Palace has not been ill, until she was seized last week with her fatal disease. I think she was about forty-five years of age. It is feared that her sudden death may have an unfavorable and possibly fatal effect on the surviving Empress in her condition of weakness.

It is impossible to say yet whether the death of the Empress of the East Palace will lead to any important political results. Should the other Empress also die, it is extremely probable that important consequences would follow, though no one can predict what they would be. Vague rumors of plottings in the palace are afloat, but as yet they are but rumors and not worth repeating.

No. 143.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 19, 1881. (Received June 13.)

SIR: In my No. 120 of February 28, last, I set forth the objectionable manner in which the Chinese authorities had put in force a regulation concerning chartered junks on the Yangtsze River, and described my interview with the Tsung-li Yamên on the subject. I expressed the opinion that the regulation was in contravention of the (amended) twenty-first article of the French treaty, and that most, if not all the ministers here agreed with me in that view. Indeed, the position could hardly be questioned, if the language of the treaty was to be taken without qualification. But on pursuing my investigation more thoroughly than I had been able to do at the time of writing you, I discovered evidence that the French minister who negotiated the twenty-first article above referred to, expressly stipulated with the Chinese Government that the article should not apply to the chartering of junks on the Yangtsze, but that the old Rule VI, of the Yangtsze regulations which provides that native craft chartered by British merchants shall pay port dues according to Chinese tariff, should remain in force. On my requesting the French minister to examine his archives and to favor me with a copy of the dispatch in which if at all this modification of article XXI, had been made, after a careful search he kindly furnished me with the communication of Mr. Bellonet to Prince Kung, dated August 20, 1865, a copy of which, with the translation, I herewith inclose. No one of the ministers here was previously aware of the existence of this document. They now all agree with me that, however objectionable the manner in which the rule requiring the native owners of chartered junks to pay port dues has been put into operation, we have no ground in the treaty stipulations to take objection to the rule itself.

In a dispatch recently received from Mr. Consul Shepard of Hankow, he argues that articles VI and XXIII of the German treaty conflict with the new rule. But neither the German minister nor I see any force in the argument. The consul reports that an attempt to freight a chartered junk since the enforcement of the new rule has utterly failed because the owners of goods were afraid the cargo would be subjected to "squeezes" on the voyage. It can hardly be doubted that an end is put to the chartering of junks by the foreigner. I shall call the attention of the foreign office to this fact on the first favorable opportunity to show them that they are depriving the junk owners of the opportunity to charter their boats to foreigners. But they are so strongly, and I fear so justly convinced that the chartering of junks is the means of defrauding the government of revenue that I have little expectation of their rescinding or modifying their order for the enforcement of this rule.

There is abundant evidence in the legations here that foreigners have in too many instances nominally chartered junks in order to enable the real shippers, Chinamen, to run the barriers and defraud the native customs. In my opinion it is this abuse rather than, as Mr. Consul Shepard suggests, a desire to aid the China Merchants' Steamship Company, which has stimulated the government to put in force a rule which has not been enforced in seventeen years.

In two dispatches to Mr. Consul Shepard I have fully set forth the views expressed by me in my No. 120 to you and in this dispatch.

Trusting that my course may meet with the approval of the Department,

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 143.]

Mr. Bellonet to Prince Kung.

PEKING, August 20, 1865.

The government of the Emperor has ordered me to announce to your imperial highness that he has consented to the surrender of the exemption from tonnage dues, which the twenty-second article of the Treaty of Tientsin secures to junks and other Chinese craft chartered by French merchants. He has, moreover, authorized me to accept the propositions contained in the dispatch of your imperial highness of the date of December 8 last, and to subject to the payment of tonnage dues every four months French vessels which coast between the different ports of China.

In exchange for these concessions the ports of Cochin-China under French jurisdiction and the ports of Japan shall be put on the same footing as those of China, as that of Hong-Kong is already; that is to say, henceforth ships of every kind carrying the French flag can ply between the ports of China, and those of Cochin-China and Japan, without being subjected to the payment of four mace, or of one mace a ton more than once in four months, no matter how many trips they make.

The government of the Emperor also agrees that Chinese craft chartered by French merchants to trade on the Yang-tsze-Kiang shall be subjected to the duties specified in article VI of the regulations concerning the navigation of that river.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 143.]

No. 57.] Mr. Shepard to Mr. Angell.

MARCH 28, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your very courteous dispatch No. 9 of February 23, in response to my No. 55. In behalf of our natural interests I warmly thank you for your prompt attention to the subject and the energetic progress you have made.

It is my duty to say that notwithstanding the assurance of the Tsung-li Yamên that the regulation I have discussed is "not intended in any way to change the status of the cargo on which the foreigner has paid duty, and that such cargo is not to be subjected to lekin anywhere along the route," yet the dangers that the charterers and shippers may be subjected to annoyances by the claim and exercise of the assumed right to stop junks for the payment of port dues along their route is so great and varied, and kindred annoyances have been so arbitrary heretofore, that not a pound of freight will be risked by shippers on board of such craft as long as the exaction exists. The regulation is in fact an absolute death-blow to the junk business, and was doubtless so intended possibly and probably to force all this freighting business into the channel of the China Merchant Steam Navigation Company's steamers, thus creating a powerful monopoly. An American charterer here has tested the result beyond cavil. He managed to secure a charter of a junk, and took from me the ordinary letter to the foreign customs for official facilities. He has labored earnestly for weeks, and has been utterly unable to get any portion of a cargo, even the slightest.

Shippers say very decidedly they will not subject their merchandise to the possible detentions and annoyances to come from responsibility to two customs, the native and the foreign, with no full protection from either. Not a single junk has been cleared through this consulate since the proclamation appeared.

In your further consideration of the matter, I respectfully call your special attention to the German treaty of 1861. It is in French in the copy I have, but it is very explicit. Article VI recites the three ports of Chinkiang, Kinkiang, and Han Kow, demonstrating that all privileges of trade were secured for the Yangtsze as far as to other ports. Riverine trade was guaranteed. The last clause of article XXIII distinctively and absolutely fixes the tonnage dues on the craft in question, and, of course, intended those dues should be paid where tonnage on all foreign vessels is paid, viz, into the foreign customs. It seems to me this vital point in the matter should be insisted upon, and that tonnage dues shall be only paid as the treaties require, and on chartered junks as on foreign-owned vessels; that is to say, all vessels in foreign control should have but one kind of treatment. No other result can give any relief to the junk traffic.

I specially note, and acquiesce in, your suggestions as to possible abuses of unscrupulous foreigners. I have constantly aimed to prevent such, and shall continue to do so with jealous regard to Chinese rights, as well as our own treaty privileges. Only a few months ago the intendant brought to my notice certain presumed abuses in chartering junks, and I promptly commenced an investigation. The agent saw fit to put obstacles in the way of my inquiry, when I promptly closed up his business by declining to give him any further official facilities.

I mention the incident to show that while I am zealous for American interests I mean ever to be just towards all native rights.

Trusting you may eventually secure a complete revocation of the objectionable regulations,

I am, &c.,

ISAAC F. SHEPARD.

No. 157.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 149.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 30, 1881. (Received June 20.)

SIR: A recent trial in Her Britannic Majesty's supreme court in China has raised certain questions which deserve the most careful consideration of the government of every nation whose citizens are employed as officials by the Chinese Government.

Edward Page, a British subject, employed in the imperial maritime customs at Canton, was arraigned upon an indictment charging him with murder and with manslaughter of a Chinaman, who on the 26th of October last was shot and killed, while attempting to smuggle goods into the country. Page pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court because, while declaring that he was not guilty, his acts on the occasion under consideration were official, and had been examined, approved, and ratified by the Tsung-li Yamên as acts of state. He maintained that Her Majesty's court ought not to take cognizance of the indictment.

Chief Justice French * * * decided that he must plead. Accordingly he pleaded "not guilty," was tried and acquitted. On the trial several customs officers, among them one or two Americans, refused as witnesses to give information in their possession on the ground of privilege, maintaining that their information belonged to the Chinese Government, and so could not properly be communicated to the court. The judge ruled that they must testify, but did not punish them for persisting in their refusal.

It is not alone the British who are concerned in the issues now raised. There are now in the customs service citizens of the United States and French and German subjects. The case has therefore attracted the attention of all the diplomatic representatives here, and all have thought it expedient to consult their governments upon the questions which this trial shows may be pressed upon us at any time.

I think the following is a fair statement of the questions in which the consuls and the ministers of the United States may be called to act, and on which therefore instructions, if the Department sees fit to send them before a case with one of our citizens actually arises, would be very acceptable.

1. If an American citizen in the official service of the Chinese Government is charged with crime, must the consul issue a writ for his arrest?

2. Must the accused obey the writ?

3. If he appears in court and pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that his act is official and is approved by the Chinese Government, must he on showing that such is the fact, be discharged?

4. Shall any distinction be made between the case, when the person injured or wronged is a Chinaman, and the case when he is a European or American?

5. Shall an American citizen in the official service of the Chinese Government, if he is summoned as a witness, be permitted by the consular court to refuse to give oral evidence on the grounds that he is commanded by his superior to refuse, and that his information is the property of the Chinese government?

It is understood that the customs authorities hold that a plan substantially like the following should be followed:

If a foreigner in the Chinese service is accused, his consul should ascertain of the Chinese authorities whether the act complained of was done in the discharge of official duty. If they reply in the affirmative, the case shall go to the minister, who will adjust it with the Chinese Government. If they reply in the negative, they shall also discharge the accused from their service, and the consul shall take up the case judicially. If the foreign employé is wanted as a witness, the summons shall be sent to him through the Chinese authorities.

I may say that the ministers all fully appreciate the desirableness of sustaining and strengthening the foreign customs as far as possible consistently with the just use of the exterritorial rights which are secured by treaty, and which for the protection of our citizens we must exercise. But I think none are of the opinion that we can go quite so far in waiving jurisdiction as the customs authorities seem to desire.

While the object of this communication is to obtain the opinions of the Department rather than to argue the questions presented, still, perhaps, I may not improperly indicate some of the results of my study of the subject here upon the ground.

I conceive that we must look upon an exercise of jurisdiction over our citizens here not merely as a privilege, but also as a duty. It is a duty to the Chinese, to the citizens of other nations, to our own citizens, and especially to the latter. It is easy to see that if we should suffer lawless American citizens to commit crime with impunity, not only should we bring deserved reproach upon our name but we should furnish a provocation for this people, who do not at all enjoy the presence of foreigners, to subject our well-disposed citizens to annoyance, if not to peril. It is, therefore, only with the greatest caution and for very cogent reasons that we should relax the hold of our laws upon our citizens.

Bearing this obvious principle in mind as we consider the fine questions above raised, I do not see.

1. How when an American citizen, even though he be in the official service of the Chinese Government, is accused of crime, we can safely relieve the consul from the duty of bringing the accused before him for some kind of judicial inquiry into the facts.

2. It follows as a matter of course that the accused must appear in response to the writ.

3. In civil cases, if the defendant pleads and proves that his act is official and approved by the Chinese Government, I think his plea should cover him. But even in such cases he should appear before the consul and plead and prove his official authority for his act. The British Government, in a case which arose in 1863, so instructed the British minister at Peking.

In a criminal case, if the person injured is a Chinaman, and the Chinese Government approves the official act by which the injury has been done, I think, on the whole, the wisest plan is in general to recognize the plea of the accused that he is protected by the approbation of the Chinese Government as valid, and to discharge him. There may be indeed some danger that feelings of animosity against foreign officials will be excited; but the Chinese are so obedient to their government that the danger is not very great, and our government can, if it becomes necessary, forbid its citizens from entering upon the Chinese service. And possibly some limit might be set to the extent to which this plea should be recognized, if it is thought that there is danger of any abuse of it in aggravated cases.

4. If the person injured is not a Chinaman, I do not see how we can escape the duty of judicial investigation. No European government would be content if one of its citizens or subjects were harmed by an American citizen in the alleged discharge of his official duty under the Chinese Government, and the accused were not fully tried in our consular court. Nor, mutatis mutandis, should we be satisfied without a consular trial of a European in the Chinese service who had injured one of our citizens. I doubt whether in any such case the plea of governmental authorization and approval of the act should be accepted as sufficient ground for the discharge of the accused.

5. In respect to what shall be required of Americans in the Chinese service, when they are called into court as witnesses, I think it must be admitted that there are some things which they should not be asked to disclose. They should be permitted to plead privilege to a certain extent. Perhaps it must be left to the consul to decide in each case how far this plea shall be extended. But in view of the inexperience and lack of legal training of some of our consuls, it would be helpful if the government should lay down some general principles for their guidance.

It should of course be regarded as the duty of the consuls and the minister to avoid in every way all unnecessary interference with the officials in the Chinese service and to discourage vexatious proceedings against them. But so long as we claim exterritorial jurisdiction over our citizens, we must faithfully discharge the duties which it imposes upon us.

No. 150.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 30, 1881. (Received June 20.)

SIR: In my No. 140, of the 11th instant, I announced the death of the Empress Dowager, commonly known as the Empress of the Eastern Palace.

I now inclose a translation of an Imperial edict, which has been communicated to me by Prince Kung. It gratefully recognizes the virtues and services of the deceased Empress, describes her illness and death, and orders the proper arrangements for official mourning to be made.

I inclose also a translation of a Farewell Mandate of the Empress. This was not officially communicated to me, but appeared in the Peking Gazette. Though drafted by some official after the Empress's death, by a customary fiction it is ascribed to her, even though it describes her falling into unconsciousness, from which, in fact, she did not awake. I think the paper may interest you.

I forward, also, a copy of my reply to Prince Kung's communication, which covered the imperial edict.

The court is still much occupied with the ceremonies of mourning.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 150.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication:

PEKING, April 11, 1881.

I have the honor to inform your excellency that on the 19th instant the grand secretariat was honored by the receipt of the following Imperial edict:

"Since Our entrance upon the inheritance of the great dynastic line, looking upward, We have been the recipient of fostering care and unbounded maternal affection from the departed Empress, T'zu-an * Twan-Yu-K'ang-Ching-Chao-Ho-Chwang-Ching.

"During the seven years which have elapsed since Our accession to the Throne, as, anticipating Her wishes, with respectable care we provided for Her wants. Our efforts have been greatly rewarded by the joyous and happy contentment which She has always manifested.

"The robust health which we seemed to recognize in Her appearance and movements, and Her zeal for state affairs at all times, were a source of great joy and comfort to our mind, and we hoped that Her life would be prolonged a hundred years, that She might long continue in the enjoyment of happiness. On the 7th instant the benign body was suddenly taken ill. A decoction of medicine was immediately given to dissipate the ailment and restore health, but unexpectedly on the following day the sickness rapidly grew dangerous, respiration was hindered by copious generation of phlegm, and the case became urgent and desperate. Between the hours of 7 and 9 p. m. the benign spirit rode in the fairy chariot and ascended to the remote regions. Prostrate upon the earth, with outstretched arms, we raised our cry to Heaven, bewailing our overwhelming grief.

"We have reverently received the dying behest of the departed Empress that the mourning garb be laid aside after twenty-seven days. Our feelings would indeed be hard to reconcile if we should do this. We shall therefore observe deep mourning for one hundred days, and half mourning for the full term of twenty-seven months, to manifest in some degree our sincere sorrow at this bereavement. The departed Empress having also admonished us to endeavor to control our sorrow and give due regard to the importance of state affairs so as to console the Empress Dowager, "Tzu-Hsi * Twan-Yü-Kang-Yi-Chao-Yü-Chwang-Ch'eng," in return for Her care in educating and nurturing us, we dare not disregard this advice, and, in respectful obedience to the bequeathed command, we shall endeavor to check and restrain our sorrow.

"Let the Prince of T'un, Yi Tsung; the Prince of Kung, Yi Hsin; the Beile, Yi-Kwang; the minister of the presence, Ching Shou; the grand secretary, Pao-Chun; the assistant grand secretary and president, Ling-Kuei; and the presidents, Ngen-Ch'eng and Ong-Fung-Ho, with respectful care attend to the rites and ceremonies to be observed in the present mourning. [Let them carefully examine the prescriptions of the old canon and memorialize us as to the appropriate rites and ceremonies to be observed. Let this decree be promulgated throughout the Empire for the information of all.]

"Respect this."

It becomes my duty to forward a reverently prepared copy of the foregoing edict for your excellency's information.

Valedictory Mandate of the Empress Dowager.

An edict of the Empress Dowager, "T'zu-An † Tuan-Yü-K'ang-Ch'ing-Chao-Ho-Chwang-Ching," saith:

Our virtues are very insignificant. We reverently received by decree of His Imperial Majesty Wen T'sung Hsién ‡ the dignity of Empress. When His Imperial Majesty Mu-Tsung-Yi § succeeded to the great heritage His filial piety was always sincere. With unaffected respect and sincerity He anticipated our wishes and zealously provided for our wants. Since His Imperial Majesty, the reigning Emperor, entered upon the inheritance of the great dynastic line His regard for our wants and zealous inquiries after our health have shown the natural sincerity of His filial piety. From the time of His accession to the Throne His great aim has been by every endeavor to attain to that perfection of a reverent and virtuous nature by a diligent pursuit of His studies, thereby greatly rejoicing and comforting our mind.

Notwithstanding the complex nature of the multifarious affairs of government which have claimed our diligent attention both night and day, it has still been our good fortune to enjoy a robust and strong bodily constitution, and we indulged the hope that our life might be prolonged till we should attain to the state of helpless old age.

On the 7th instant we were attacked by a slight indisposition. His Imperial Majesty waited on us with a restorative, and was solicitous for Our health, praying for Our speedy recovery. Unexpectedly, on the following day Our condition became dangerous, and gradually, about the hour of 8 p. m., Our senses became scattered, until all hope of recovery has passed away.

Our age has reached the number of forty and five years. During the twenty years in which we have enjoyed the exalted rank and prerogative of Mother of the Nation, we have frequently been blessed with the bestowment on us of titles of honor on every occasion of national rejoicing. There is nothing on which we can look back with disappointment.

Believing that His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor, will naturally be smitten with great grief at this bereavement, and as in His character of Lord of the people the whole nation is interested in the welfare of His person, we hereby enjoin on Him the wisdom of moderating His sorrow in view of the great importance of state affairs, and looking upward to comfort and solace Her who had labored for His instruction and education, the Empress Dowager "T'zu Hsi*-Tuan-Yu-K'ang-Yi-Chao Yü-Chwang Ch'eng."

It is our hope that all our officials, both civil and military, in the capital and the provinces may, by sedulous attention to their official duties, help to bring about good rule. Thus in truth will our soul rest in happiness.

As regards the observance of mourning, it is Our wish that His Majesty, the Emperor, will, on consultation, and in obedience to the prescriptions of the old canon, lay aside the mourning garb after twenty-seven days. On no account should any departure or diminution be made in the usual ceremonies of worship and sacrifice in the large state temples, nor should the rites and observances of the smaller temples be interrupted. We have heretofore been the leading example of economy and frugality in the palace, but we do not wish to dissimulate Our modesty by willing that any abatement be made in all matters of mourning as prescribed by canon. We wish, however, that a little moderation should be practiced in regard to funeral trappings and ceremony, that due regard may be given to economizing labor and material. Thus will compliance be shown with the modest wishes of our daily life.

Wherefore we have given utterance to the foregoing decree. May all concerned act in obedience thereto.

I have the honor to receive your imperial highness's communication of the 11th instant containing the edict of His Imperial Majesty concerning the death of the Empress Dowager T'zu Au-Tuan-Yü Kang-Ch'ing-Chao-Ho-Chwang-Ching.

I desire, in behalf of the government and the nation which I represent, to express sincere sympathy with His Imperial Majesty and with this nation, which they will feel on hearing of the death of the Empress Dowager, who has fulfilled the duties of her high office with such devotion to the welfare of the people and such helpfulness to their Imperial Majesties Tung Chih and Kwang Su.

No. 159.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 151.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Peking, April 30, 1881. (Received June 20.)

SIR: In my No. 95, of January 14 last, I reported the latest negotiations between the diplomatic body and the foreign office on the subject of transit passes outwards. The decision which the representatives of the western powers reached at their conference of January 4 was communicated on January 9 to the Tsung-li Yamên by Mr. von Brandt in a paper herewith inclosed.

As before stated, that decision was to adhere to our previous propositions, except that Rule II should be modified so as to state specfically what articles of foreign manufacture or origin and what articles of native manufacture or origin shall be duty free.

On February 9 the Tsung-li Yamên replied to Mr. von Brandt in a communication, a copy of which is inclosed. They take exception in some particulars to the amended Rule II (inclosed in No. 95), and especially indicate that in their opinion the terms "household stores" and "ship's stores" need to be defined. They ask us to wait until the inspector-general of customs has furnished them a list of articles which can be considered "ship's stores."

As to goods manufactured from native produce, they still desire that these shall be reported to the customs for examination.

I have delayed forwarding these papers in the hope that we might come to some definite understanding on the subject. But progress has been so long hindered by various causes that I deem it best to acquaint you with the present state of the correspondence.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 151.]

Mr. von Brandt to the Tsung-li Yamên.

JANUARY 9, 1881.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellencies' communication dated December 5, being an answer to a note from me on the subject of outward transit passes and other questions.

I regret sincerely that the state of my health has prevented me from discussing the question verbally with your excellencies, as my intention had been, and still prevents my going to the Yamên. In order, however, not to lose any more time, I have now the honor to lay before your excellencies in writing the reply to your note of December 5, which I have been authorized by my colleagues to make to it.

With regard to the first point, the list of duty-free goods, there can be no doubt in the opinion of my colleagues and myself that certain articles in the list being marked "foreign" and others not, under the first ones articles of foreign origin are understood, and under the other ones those of foreign or native origin. The articles of foreign origin would, of course, be imported and then pay no import duty, while those of native origin would be exported and pay no export duty. The mention of transit duty in connection with duty-free articles clearly refers only to goods of foreign origin, as in the body of the treaty no provision is made for the application of the transit-duty rule to native produce carried inland.

As the discussion now going on between the Yamên and the foreign representatives is, however, intended, in the first instance, to do away with such difficulties as have arisen from time to time, and as would, unless remedied, be likely to cause misunderstandings and ill-feeling between China and the treaty powers, my colleagues and myself propose to the Yamên to accept, in lieu of Trade Rule 2 as read until now, the version annexed herein, which, to my colleagues and to myself, seems to have the undoubted advantage of doing away with the ambiguity which your excellencies seem to find in the expressions used in the original rule.

As your excellencies will see from the annex, it is only for sixteen articles of native origin that my colleagues and myself claim freedom from export duty under the treaties, and as none of these articles is of much importance, we hope that the Yamên will see in this proposal, which we substitute for section II of the former proposal, the means of coming to an understanding with the foreign representatives.

With regard to the second point, the treatment on exportation of native produce bought in the port by a foreigner and exported by him, my colleagues and myself must insist on the necessity of giving to the treaty rule that on such produce nothing but the tariff export duty has to be paid, a full and explicit reassertion in the proposed agreement. If the treaty rule had been strictly observed by all the provincial authorities such reassertion would, of course, be unnecessary, but as, on the contrary, attempts have been frequently made by local authorities to force foreign exporters to pay transit duties on goods bought at the port, my colleagues and myself trust that your excellencies will understand the desirability and necessity of the rule contained in the treaty being announced in a form less likely to give rise to misunderstandings.

On the subject of goods manufactured from native produce, my colleagues and myself fail to see how, by such a process going on at the open ports, the goods so manufactured paying export duty on exportation any confusion can arise. It is generally believed to be a sound principle of political economy that industry and commerce will develop the more rapidly and become a greater source of revenue to the state the less they are interfered with and hampered by rules and regulations.

My colleagues and myself hope, therefore, that your excellencies will withdraw your opposition to section III, which, after all, contains nothing but a reassertion of the state of things as created by the treaties, while the introduction of the measures of supervision proposed by the Yamên would be an innovation, and, as such, as we firmly believe, fraught with serious dangers and difficulties.

Before closing this letter I beg to state that, though the last delay in the negotiations has been due to my inability of meeting your excellencies, my colleagues and myself would feel so much the more obliged to your excellencies for a speedy reply, as the necessity for stricter instructions being issued to the local authorities makes itself more strongly felt.

I avail myself, &c.,

VON BRANDT.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 151.]

The Tsung-li Yamên to His Excellency Mr. von Brandt, in reply.

This office has had the honor to receive your excellency's dispatch of January 9, last, containing, among other statements, the following:

* * * "My colleagues and myself propose to the Yamên to accept instead of Trade Rule No. II as read until now, the version annexed herein, which to my colleagues and myself seems to have the undoubted advantage of doing away with the ambiguity which your excellencies seem to find in the expressions used in the original rule. * * * We hope that the Yamên will see its way to accept this proposal which we substitute for section II of the former proposal. * * * With regard to the second point, the treatment on exportation of native produce bought in the port by a foreigner and exported by him, my colleagues and myself must insist upon the necessity of giving to the treaty rule that on such produce nothing but the tariff export duty has to be paid a full and explicit reassertion in the proposed agreement. * * * On the subject of goods manufactured out of native produce, my colleagues and myself fail to see how, by such a process going on at the open ports, the goods so manufactured paying export duty on exportation, any confusion can arise. * * * My colleagues and myself would feel exceedingly obliged to your excellencies for a speedy reply."

This office finds, in Rule II now proposed by your excellency, in the list of goods of both native or foreign origin which it is claimed shall be duty free, the two items, viz: Indian meal* and sago*; whereas it is stated in the export tariffs of all the treaties that "rice or paddy, wheat, millet, and other grains" shall pay an export duty of 1 mace for 100 catties; butter is also claimed to be duty-free in the same list, when the Russian treaty stipulates that this article shall pay an export duty of 3 mace per 100 catties. The above articles are therefore not included in the list of duty-free goods according to the treaties.

The Chinese text of Trade Rule No. 2 reads thus: "* * * foreign clothing, jewelry, plated ware," &c. In the form of Rule 2, now submitted, the items clothing and plated ware are included in the list of goods of foreign manufacture or origin, while jewelry is included in the list of both foreign or native manufacture or origin; this difference is not in harmony with the original purport of the rule.

Then again, the words, "household stores," and "ship's stores" are very comprehensive terms. If the goods included under these designations are not particularized, all manner of goods may be termed stores and thus claim exemption from duty, to the great detriment of our revenue.

*In the form of Rule II submitted to the Yamên, the characters used are

" " yu mi mien" for "Indian meal," and

"  " sha Ku" for "sago," while in the Yamên's reply the two articles are spoken of as

" " mi Ku." The latter characters really mean "husked and unhusked grains," but they may be intended as an abbreviation of the words as expressed in full in the form submitted.

The addition of the characters "and articles of this class" to the item cutlery is also open to the above objection,

This office proposes to wait till the inspector-general of customs will have made out a list of the articles used in dock-yards to be considered ship's stores, when correspondence can again be had between us to determine with precision what articles are included in the foregoing designations.

In regard to the second point, the treaties state in explicit terms that native produce purchased by foreign merchants shall pay on exportation no more than the tariff export duty.

It is therefore quite proper that this point be explicitly stated in reassertion of the spirit of the treaty.

With regard to goods manufactured out of native produce, purchased by foreign merchants, it is apprehended that irregularities will occur if the goods are not previously reported at the customs for examination, while it will be quite simple to proceed with the operation after the goods have passed the examination. This office forwarded, in a previous communication, two rules in this connection which clearly explain the requirements of the situation, and we have still to request your excellency to give to them your favorable consideration.

Apologizing for the delay in answering your excellency's communication, we remain, &c.

Cards and compliments.

[Extract.]

No. 152.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 30, 1881. (Received June 20.)

SIR: I have to describe to you an event, such as fortunately it has seldom been the duty of this legation to report, the disturbance by some lawless Chinese of one of the American missionary stations in Peking. Happily no serious harm has been done to person or property, though for at least twenty-four hours the missionary families at the station which was menaced were kept in a state of not a little solicitude. It was the compound of the Presbyterian mission which was threatened. Their station is very near the northern wall of the city, perhaps 4 miles from this legation, and 2½ miles from the residence of any other foreigners. Their compound is pretty large, containing within it a chapel, two school-houses, two dwelling-houses, and other buildings. The members of the mission are Rev. John Wherry and family, Rev. D. C. McCoy and family, B. C. Atterbury, M. D., and Miss Barr. Miss Douw had left for home a week before this disturbance.

The Rev. Mr. McCoy, who has resided here many years, being about to visit America, had publicly announced that on Saturday, April 23, at 1 o'clock p. m., he would sell by auction certain of his effects. A number of lawless Chinamen made their way into the court yard during the sale and began to break the branches of some flowering shrubs. On being requested to desist, they were very insolent. When they were asked to leave the premises, some refused to go, and some of those who went began throwing brickbats, tiles, and other missiles into the court. From this time the crowd rapidly increased, soon filled the street and became very annoying. Messengers were sent to the police office of the neighborhood, and some little show of attempting to control the mischievous fellows was made, but apparently there was no earnestness in the attempt, and it was entirely unsuccessful.

Mr. McCoy therefore very properly concluded at last to send a messenger to me. The messenger reached me at 9 o'clock in the evening.

I at once sent back word that I would act without delay. Soon after two messages reached me announcing that the crowd had dispersed. But I thought it wise to send Mr. Taylor, our acting interpreter, to the Tsung-li Yamên to announce what I had heard, and to request that an adequate police force be sent at once to protect the place. At that hour of the night none of the ministers are at the foreign office, but two of the secretaries who were there promised that the desired orders should be promptly sent. Meantime the British minister having kindly offered to send one of his mounted escort men to the mission, I wrote to Mr. McCoy what I had done. The English constable returned at 1 o'clock a. m. bringing the assurance from Mr. McCoy that quiet still continued. But the constable reported that suspicious looking men were lingering about the premises.

On Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m., I rode up to the mission. I found about 50 Chinamen gathered in front of the gate, and Rev. Mr. Wherry, one of the missionaries, talking with them. I inspected the premises and became satisfied from what I saw and heard that within an hour there would again be a large assemblage in the street and danger of further trouble. So I galloped as rapidly as possible to the legation and with the interpreter hurried to the foreign office to complain that no proper police force had yet been sent, and to represent that action must be taken without the least delay. As it was then (at noon) too early for the ministers to be at the foreign office, I saw one of the secretaries, who assured me that all I asked should be done immediately.

Meantime Sir Thomas Wade, having heard that I had gone to the mission and that a throng was gathering there, had kindly sent his Chinese secretary, Mr. Baber, with a mounted escort first to the foreign office and thence to the mission.

Soon after my return from the foreign office I received the news that, as I had anticipated, a crowd of some hundreds had gathered about the mission premises, that they were making offensive demonstrations, but that a police sergeant had made one arrest, and that this had caused many of the Chinese to go away. But I thought it judicious for me to see the ministers of the foreign office. So at 2:30 p. m., I went up again and met three of them. I found them apparently very desirous of putting an immediate end to the trouble. They informed me that his excellency Ch'ung, who is one of their number, and who is also lieutenant-general, in command of the troops of the western half of the city, had already gone to the scene of disorder. I suggested that there should be a guard left there through the night and that some suitable proclamation should be posted on the walls to prevent any further trouble. They said that they would attend to all this. I sent a messenger to the mission to announce the result of my interview with the ministers. In about two hours the messenger returned with the news that Ch'ung had arrived on the ground early in the afternoon with 40 soldiers, had arrested 5 men, and that the crowd had dispersed. The foreign office sent me a similar report at evening, a copy of which I inclose.

Monday morning early I sent up a messenger, who reported that 20 soldiers had guarded the premises through the night, and that there had been no disturbance there, but that the drug store and residence of one of the Chinese converts had been stoned. I sent Mr. Taylor to the foreign office to thank them for their action, to request that the proclamation be posted on a chapel, which the mission owns and occupies in another street, and also to inquire whether it might not wisely be placed on the residence of the Chinese church member who had been disturbed, and whether there was any reason why Mr. McCoy should not set out on his journey on the following day. In a few hours I received a message from the foreign office saying that the proclamation would be posted on the street chapel and that Mr. McCoy could depart whenever he wished, and that if desired they would furnish him a military escort. As to the druggist, he being a Chinaman, had only to apply to the local authorities if he needed protection.

In the afternoon I visited the mission and found the soldiers still there. I learned also that the local police official, the Ting-erh, had been removed and degraded, but whether for his inefficiency or for some other cause I do not know. He desired an interview with me to ask that I would intercede for his restoration to office; I declined to see him. While I was there, the proclamation of En, the military governor of the city, and Ch'ung and Wen the lieutenant-generals, was posted on the wall opposite the entrance to the mission. I inclose a translation of it.

On Tuesday, the 26th, the five men who had been arrested and probably bambooed, were placed before the gate of the mission with cangues upon their necks.

And so I trust this affair has ended. The Tsung-li Yamên have shown the most commendable spirit in their treatment of the case. In truth the affair has an importance just now which in ordinary circumstances it would not have, and it is not at all improbable that this, not very serious disturbance, has happened just in time to prevent a graver disorder. There has been for the last two or three weeks a rapidly increasing flood of rumors in and about Peking of some sort of a general movement against foreigners. One day the report has come that the towers of one of the Roman Catholic churches, or the church itself, was to be destroyed. The next day the story was that the stone posts and chains which make an inclosure in front of the French legation were to be torn down. The ignorant populace feed on such tales and become morbidly excited, so that the slightest disturbance may easily grow into a serious affair.

* * * * * * *

I spoke to the Yamên of these rumors, as some of the other ministers have also done. They assured me that they were desirious of learning who originated them and of punishing severely such persons. And well they may be. For repeatedly in China, such reports have been the precursors and in large part the causes of serious disorder and of crimes. The prompt treatment of this little disturbance at the Presbyterian mission will doubtless prevent any further trouble in the city.

I have taken occasion formally to thank Sir Thomas Wade for the aid he kindly gave me.

Just as I am closing this dispatch I have received from the foreign office a communication (semi-official) reciting the action which has been taken by the authorities in suppressing this disorder at the mission.

I shall at once send them a communication expressing my appreciation of the course of the Tsung-li Yamên and the military authorities, I inclose a copy.

Semi-official.] PEKING, April 24, 1881.

With reference to the disturbance in the Yen-erh Hutung,* the writers have to state that his excellency Ch'ung has proceeded to the locality, in person, to suppress the mob. Five men have been arrested and will be punished. Quiet has now been restored, and moreover a small company of men have been ordered to remain there for protection. The writers trust there will be no farther cause for anxiety, and write this special letter for your excellency's information.

Memorandum of instructions to Mr. Taylor.

APRIL 25, 1881.

Mr. Taylor will see one or more of the secretaries of the Tsung-li Yamên. He will ask them to convey to the ministers my thanks for their action yesterday, and for sending me information last evening.

He will say that while they are posting proclamations I would be obliged to them to order one posted on the chapel called 真神堂 in order to prevent disturbances there when services are held there.

He will also report that last night disorderly persons threw stones on to the roof and into the court of one of the members of the church, doubtless because he is a member of the church. I would respectfully suggest to their excellencies whether in the interests of order, which they are so faithfully striving to preserve, it might not be well to post one of the proclamations on the residence of this man which is known as 天益堂.

He will say that Mr. McCoy had intended to leave to-morrow for Tung Chow, and ask whether it is advisable that he delay his departure at all.

JAMES B. ANGELL.

Semi-official note from the Tsung-li Yamên.

The writers have communicated to the ministers the matters about which the interpreter came to this office to speak this morning, and have been instructed by their excellencies to say in reply that, as requested, a proclamation will be posted on the door of the chapel called Chen Shen T'ang (真神堂.) The shopkeeper of the shop Tien Yi T'ang (天益堂) however being a Chinaman, questions relating to Chinese subjects must come under the jurisdiction of the local authorities; and it is inexpedient for this office to go beyond its province.

His excellency Mr. Angell, we doubt not, understands this.

*The street in which the American Presbyterian mission is situated.

As to whether it would be advisable for the missionary (Mr. McCoy) to postpone his departure, we have to say that it is unnecessary that he should be caused any detention for a small affair like this, seeing he has fixed the day for his departure. We propose as a fitting arrangement, if Mr. Angell will inform us by letter of the day when he intends to start, to send a military escort to see him out of the city.

Proclamation of En, Ch'ung, and Wen (chief military authorities of Peking).

Let all you people clearly understand this:

Whereas, at the sale of furniture which took place at the chapel in the Yen Erh Hu-Tung, the said sale being conducted with perfect fairness between buyer and seller, there were ignorant fellows who crowded the place and availed themselves of the situation to create a disturbance, thereby greatly hindering and damaging the sale:

Therefore we issue this proclamation and expect you residents in the neighborhood, both soldiers and commoners, likewise you passers-by, one and all, to clearly understand that you are not to yield to your feelings and loiter in the vicinity of the chapel to create a disturbance. If after this admonition there be fellows who disregard this proclamation and dare to create a disturbance, we trust to the local police and the military, whom we shall send in addition, to arrest them and send them to our office, when severe punishment will be dealt out. On no account will any indulgence be shown.

Let none disregard this special proclamation.

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

APRIL 30, 1881.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication (semi-official) from the foreign office, describing the action which has been taken in suppressing the disorder at the American mission in the Yen erh Hu Tong.

I desire to express my grateful appreciation of the prompt and vigorous action of the higher authorities in arresting and punishing five persons, in posting a proclamation, and in guarding the premises.

No. 156.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, May 2, 1881. (Received June 20.)

SIR: In my No. 152, of April 30, I spoke of rumors current among the Chinese to the effect that some harm was to be done to the property or persons of foreigners in Peking. In my interview with the Tsung-li Yamên, on the 23d ultimo, I referred to these mischievous reports, and they assured me that they should endeavor to detect the originators of the rumors and to punish them.

At the instance of the foreign office the military authorities have now issued a proclamation, a copy of which I inclose. It has not been communicated to me officially. The translation which I forward to you is of a copy taken from the posters on the streets. The prefect of the district which comprises Peking and the suburbs has issued a similar proclamation.

There is no cause for any solicitude concerning the safety of foreigners in Peking.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 156.]

Proclamation of En, Ch'ung, and Wen (the chief military authorities of Peking).

Let all you people clearly understand this:

A communication has been received from the Tsung-li Yamên, reciting as follows: "China and foreign nations have always been on terms of peace since commercial relations were established long ago. The government has the same considerate regard for strangers as for her own subjects, and treats all alike with the same rule of conduct. Now, it has recently come to our ears that many extraordinary stories are going the rounds in the streets and by-lanes. There must be some discontented, meddlesome fellows who invent stories among themselves and go about spreading them in such a way that it is really to be apprehended that falsehood upon falsehood will foment some real trouble. We have to request that a strict proclamation will be issued to put a stop to this, so that virtuous, law-abiding people may not be deceived by these stories," &c.

Having received the above, it is right that we should issue a public notification. Wherefore this proclamation. We expect you, officers and soldiers of the local guard stations, to take careful note that if there be lawless, discontented vagabonds and loafers, as aforesaid, who fabricate stories with a view to creating a disturbance, you are to arrest them on the spot and send them in chains to this office to be severely punished. On no account will any indulgence be shown. And you, soldiers and people, we hereby admonish you, on the issuing of this proclamation, to go about your respective duties and not give ear to false stories whereby you may involve yourselves in trouble. Let all concerned tremble and obey this special proclamation.

No. 159.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, May 21, 1881. (Received July 5.)

SIR: In my No. 42 I described the state of the negotiations between the diplomatic body and the Tsung-li Yamên concerning the propositions for dredging the Woosung bar below Shanghai. In the inclosures was an absurd paper from the foreign office, setting forth imaginary evils to flow from the deepening of the river. Sir Thomas Wade, chairman of the committee on the subject, was requested by his colleagues to reply to that paper. This he did in a communication, a copy of which I inclose. I have delayed forwarding this in the hope that the negotiations might be advanced a stage before I should report upon them. But I see no signs of any further movement at present by the Chinese authorities, and so to complete the record I send you the paper of the British minister. It is very trying that the commerce of the world should be subjected to such delays and expense, when all that is asked of the Chinese Government is permission to improve the navigation without any charge to them. The real cause of their hesitation is doubtless fear of foreign iron-clads in case of war.

[Inclosure in No. 159.]

Semi-official note to prince and ministers of the Tsung-li Yamên.

DECEMBER 5, 1881.

Sir Thomas Wade presents his compliments to the Tsung-li Yamên.

Sir Thomas Wade has communicated to his colleagues, the representatives of the treaty powers in Peking, the substance of the observations made by the ministers of the Yamên upon the memorandum of the 5th October regarding the Woosung bar, to which their attention had been invited by Sir Thomas Wade when he was at the Yamên on the 13th November.

These observations were, in general, to the effect that the question is a local question, and, if admitting of solution at all, must be solved by the local government. It was one on which the Tsung-li Yamên could not undertake to issue peremptory instructions. After much discussion the ministers requested that they might be supplied, before going further, with a statement of the objections taken to the arguments of the local authorities as set forth in their memorandum of the 5th October.

It will be remembered that when, in 1874, the Chinese Government was invited to undertake the removal of the Woosung bar, the chief objection raised was that the bar was, in a military sense, the natural protection of the mouth of the river. This position at least appears to have been abandoned. On the 25th October Admiral Cooke had an interview at Nanking with the governor-general, Lin, in which he took occasion to urge his excellency Lin very seriously to consider the abatement of the evil so long complained of. The admiral's own ship had been detained at Woosung five days; but it was principally in the interest of commerce, native and foreign, that he now drew attention to it. The admiral had understood that the Chinese general had been led to suppose that the bar might prevent the ingress of foreign men-of war in the event of a rupture with a foreign power, but, were the way open, the Chinese Government, in such a case, would easily block it by torpedoes or sunken vessels.

The governor-general, Lin, hastened to assure him that none but stupid people who knew nothing about the matter could use such arguments as these. He, the governor-general, well knew that the entrance could easily be stopped by artificial means. The principal objections urged against the dredging operations proposed, his excellency understood, were two: first, that if the channel were deepened and widened, larger waves would roll in, and that this would make the water rougher inside, to the inconvenience of small craft; secondly, that there would be a greater influx of salt water, and that this would render the river unfit for irrigation of the fields on its banks. The governor-general added that he could not of himself answer for the validity of these objections. He merely mentioned them as having been made.

The same objections appear in much the same words in the report of the taotai of Shanghai embodied in the Yamên's memorandum of the 5th October, and it is difficult to suppose that the official who framed such a report can have resided at Shanghai, or can have ever had an opportunity of observing the action of the tide in any river elsewhere. The tide of the great river Yangtsze is often felt at more than 250 miles above its mouth. The current is far more rapid than the current of the Woosung River, and the waves rise high as out at sea, yet the banks are lined with small craft, no larger than those seen inside the Woosung bar, and it has never been stated that the waters of the Yangtsze, which frequently flood the land, were injurious to irrigation.

The water brought up by the Woosung river to Shanghai in the highest tides before the embankments were built used frequently to rise into the very gardens and court yards of foreign houses; but it is a more salt water than the water of the great river, of which it is but a small affluent; and during the thirty-odd years that the settlement has existed no one has ever heard that irrigation has suffered from the influx of the river water. The deepening of the channel across the bar by a few feet will not cause the tides to rise higher than formerly.

On the other hand the deepening of the channel will be of immense benefit to steamers, and the advantage obtained by these is not as the taotai's report contends, exclusively of importance to the owners of these steamers, or even to foreign trade. The cargoes borne by the steamers are not the property of persons or companies who run them. The larger the steamer the greater the advantage to the trading community, for the larger the vessel, the lower freights can it afford to charge. Every one engaged in business, native or foreigner, is benefited by facilitation of the ingress and egress of these vessels, which are now, when entering the port or leaving it, detained at the mouth of the river by an obstacle, the removal of which can inflict no injury whatever on the Chinese Government and people; which in most other countries the government would think it an obligation to remove, but which, in this instance, the trading community interested is prepared to effect the removal of without any expense whatever to the government of the country.

In conclusion, the proposal submitted to the Chinese Government is one, the adoption of which will incontestably advantage both native and foreign trades. It can inflict no possible injury upon either the government or the people of China, and the representatives of treaty powers do hope that the governor-general, Lin, if the decision rests with him, will be made to see that the objections made by his subordinates are groundless.

As regards the reduction to practice of the scheme proposed by the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce, the association of the commissioner of customs with the committee or board of directors will in itself be an ample guarantee for the due protection of any interest of the Chinese Government affected by the arrangement in contemplation.

No. 163.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 173.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, June 18, 1881. (Received August 1.)

SIR: I am happy to announce that at my request the Chinese Government has taken action which will furnish to Protestant Chinese converts a relief from what they and our American missionaries have regarded as a serious grievance. This action will not only afford much satisfaction to our missionaries and to all our people, who are interested in the missionary work in China, but will, I think, remove what has been to some extent a cause of friction between the local officials and the missionaries who wished, naturally enough, to shield their converts from a burden of taxation imposed to sustain heathen ceremonies and amusements.

Throughout the empire, in all the towns and villages, from time to time the people assemble at festivals where acts of heathen worship and public amusement are ingeniously combined. Now a god is received with a stately procession and placed upon his pedestal in a temple; now costly incense is burned before him. Often theatrical performances form a part of the public entertainment connected with the ceremonies at the temple. The funds to defray the expenses of these festivals are often collected as a sort of tax by officials. So long as all the attendants were of the faith of the conductors of the festival, this mode of meeting the expenditure was unobjectionable; but when some of the Chinese espoused Christianity, whether under the instructions of the Roman Catholic or the Protestant missionaries, they very properly desired to be exempted from contributing to the expense of ceremonies which they believed to be sinful. Accordingly as long ago as 1862, the Roman Catholics directed the attention of the Chinese Government to the matter, and, through the interposition of the French minister, induced Prince Kung to issue an order, which afforded to Chinese converts to the Roman Catholic faith the relief which they desired. Unhappily, perhaps, a different Chinese term has been used in treaties to designate Christianity, when the Roman Catholic faith is referred to, from that which is used to express the idea when the Protestant faith is spoken of. Therefore, although probably the Chinese Government was as willing to grant to Chinese Protestants as to Chinese Roman Catholics the privilege secured by the order of 1862, and although the Protestant converts have sometimes, in dealing with local officials, successfully appealed to the order as substantially protecting them; still there have been many cases in which assessments for the heathen celebrations have been levied on the Protestant converts. This has been regarded by them as a great hardship, and the Protestant missionaries to whose flocks they belonged have deeply sympathized with them, and have at times remonstrated with the local officials who enforced the assessment.

In 1867, when it was thought that perhaps there might be a general revision of the treaties of China with foreign powers, nearly all the American missionaries then resident in China, wrote to Mr. Burlingame, earnestly asking that in the revision this subject among others might be considered and that if possible, immunity against forced contributions to heathen celebrations be secured to Protestant converts.

My attention was attracted to the matter a few months ago. I was not certain that under article XXIX of the treaty of 1858, we might not ask the Chinese Government to relieve the Protestant converts from the exactions above referred to. But it is so extremely delicate a matter to seem to interpose ourselves in the least between Chinese subjects and their own government, that in all my treatment of missionary questions I have felt that that article was to be used only with the utmost caution in seeking the protection of Chinese converts against Chinese officials. Furthermore, it was so obviously just that the privileges extended to Roman Catholic converts should be granted to Protestant converts, that I could not believe the government would insist on making any distinction in its treatment of them.

On careful reflection, therefore, I decided to avail myself of the first favorable opportunity to speak with the Tsung-li Yamên on the subject. Having occasion to visit the foreign office on some other business on the 31st ultimo, I broached the matter. The ministers at once expressed their willingness to have an order issued, granting the wished-for protection to Protestant converts. They requested me to communicate my desire in writing and promised to give it early attention.

Accordingly, I addressed to Prince Kung the communication, a copy of which I inclose. On the 12th instant I received his reply, which also I forward. It is in every respect satisfactory.

I shall inform our consuls of this action of the government, that they may make it known to our American missionaries.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 173.]

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

PEKING, June 3, 1881.

I have before me a copy of a most just and generous order, which your imperial highness issued in Tung Chih, 1st year, 1st moon (1862), assuring to Chinese, who had espoused the Roman Catholic faith (the religion of the Lord of Heaven) exemption from certain assessments for idolatrous processions, etc., which they could not, consistently with their religion, consent to pay. In this order you say very properly of these people:

"They cannot, on the ground of being members of the church, expect to be exempt from all contribution for public purposes. If labor were wanted for government service or money to secure useful ends were to be levied, Christian converts are liable, in the former case, to be impressed for duty, and in the latter to be taxed in the same manner as other men."

You then add, however:

"But they are never to be compelled to give anything towards receiving gods, idolatrous processions, theatrical performances, and incense offerings, and the like, because in none of these are they interested. If local authorities meet with subscriptions which have a mixed nature, civil and religious, they must honestly and rightfully separate one from the other and not impose them without judgment or discrimination. For instance were a fund to be raised, four-tenths of which were for public objects and six-tenths for useless (idolatrous) objects, the authorities must distinctly point out that Christians are liable only for the four-tenths, and are not to be compelled to pay the remaining six-tenths, the latter being for uses which do not concern them.

"Again, should Christians, on account of their refusal to be assessed their share towards these useless services, which are contrary to their Christian principles, be ill treated or beaten or be plundered of their property, or have their crops burnt or destroyed, the local authorities must investigate the matter to the bottom in the sufferers' behalf, and rigidly punish the offenders according to law and order them to fully compensate for what was plundered, burnt, or destroyed, and it must be just and equal."

I suppose this order has served to protect the Chinese converts of the Roman Catholic faith, but I have been informed by American missionaries who hold the Protestant faith, that some of the Chinese converts to their religion, who are good and loyal subjects, have been much annoyed by demands for assessments for receiving gods, idolatrous processions, theatrical performances, incense offerings, and the like. It is contrary to the principles of their faith to contribute for such purposes.

I do not doubt that the government of His Imperial Majesty desires to treat them with the same consideration which it has shown to the Roman Catholic converts.

I venture therefore, respectfully, to ask whether your imperial highness would not think it proper and just to secure by proclamation, or by order to the provincial authorities, or in some other way, the same protection in this matter to the Chinese converts to the Protestant faith which has been accorded to the Roman Catholic converts. I am sure that by so doing you would gladden the hearts of many of your countrymen and give another proof of that spirit of justice which your imperial highness has so long shown in treating the often delicate questions raised by the work of foreign missionaries in China.

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 173.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

PEKING, June 12, 1881.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication of the 3d instant, as follows (here follows the text of Mr. Angell's No. 35 to Prince Kung).

In reply I beg to state that I have forwarded communications to the generals, lieutenant-generals, governors-general, and governors of the various provinces, and to the governors of the prefecture of Shuntien and of Moukden, requesting them to instruct their subordinate officers so that all may know that the decree issued by this office in the first year of Tung Chih (1862), is to apply alike to Roman Catholic and Protestant converts. I also forward a copy of the communication above referred to for your excellency's information.

[Inclosure.]

A communication from the Tsung-li Yamên.

In the 1st year of Tung Chih (1862), this office received a communication from the French minister Pu (———), stating that the cause of disagreement in the provinces between converts and non-converts was owing to the fact that the local officers made no distinction in levying subscriptions for receiving spirits, idolatrous processions, and such like expenditure to which Christians should not properly be required to contribute; and he requested this office to instruct the local officers to stop calling upon Christians to subscribe for such purposes as the latter were averse to doing so; on that representation, this office memorialized the Throne and issued instructions to the provincial officers for their guidance. We also caused copies of a decree to be printed which we sent to the French minister, to be given to his missionaries and kept by them (for reference), and, on the other hand, we sent around (to the provincial officers) copies of the same decree. The above facts are on record.

On the 31st of May last, the American minister, Mr. Angell, came to this office, and in conversation referred to the fact that the said decree only mentioned Roman Catholics and made no reference to Protestant converts; that the latter were well-disposed and law-abiding, but that they did not enjoy the immunity (granted by the decree). He felt sensitive on this point. Shortly after a dispatch was received from him, in which he says in conclusion:

"I venture, therefore, to ask whether your imperial highness would not think it proper and just to secure, by proclamation or by order to the provincial authorities, or in some other way, the same protection in this matter to the Chinese converts to the Protestant faith which has been accorded to the Roman Catholics."

This office finds that Roman Catholic converts have hitherto been exempted from contributing to receiving spirits, idolatrous processions, and such like ceremonies, but in the case of subscriptions for public purposes, or government labor when wanted, or subscriptions to secure useful ends, converts and non-converts are alike liable to be impressed or taxed as the case requires. This is the rule which has been followed in the provinces for some years.

Although there are points of dissimilarity in the Roman Catholic and Protestant religions as practiced by the people, the government has the same considerate regard for all, and its only hope is that converts and non-converts may forever live on terms of peace. It has no intention to make the least discrimination between Roman Catholics or Protestants.

Having received Mr. Angell's communication as stated above, we feel bound to communicate with your excellencies the generals, lieutenant-generals, governors-general, and governors in the various provinces, and hope you will in turn instruct your subordinate officers so that all may know that the decree issued by this office in the first year of Tung Chih, is to apply alike to Roman Catholic and Protestant converts.

No. 164.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 174.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, June 20, 1881. (Received August 1.)

SIR: On the 12th instant there came into my possession an extraordinary paper, which I inclose. It was the draft of the agreement between the Chinese Government and the Northern Telegraph Company. You may remember that this is a Danish company, which owns the cable running from Shanghai down the coast, and also that running via Japan to Vladivostock, connecting with the overland line, thence to Europe. I was informed that the agreement had been signed on the 8th instant by Li Hung Chang, the viceroy of this province, and by Mr. Henningsen, an officer of the company.

You will observe that the first article of this agreement, among other things, pledges the Chinese Government to forbid any person or corporation, except the Northern Telegraph Company, to land telegraph cables anywhere in the empire, including all foreign settlements and the island of Formosa.

The second article binds the government to abstain from constructing, and to prevent others from constructing, submarine cables or land lines of telegraph in opposition to any of the company's cables in China.

The third article needs no attention. In the fourth is the pecuniary compensation which the company makes for this monopoly, namely, it gives the government the privilege of transmitting free of charge its messages to and from its diplomatic representatives and consuls-general abroad.

The fifth article provides that, if not otherwise directed by the senders, messages for Europe shall be sent via Siberia, and not by the southern route. This is because the company owns the entire northern line, but only a portion of the southern line to Europe, and has to divide with other companies a portion of the proceeds of messages ransmitted via Singapore.

Such is the general scope of this remarkable document. It should not be overlooked, however, that by the terms of the first article the government reserves to itself the right to refuse even to this favored company the permission to land any more cables.

Remembering that it was largely due to the hearty co-operation of the representatives of other powers than Denmark with the accomplished minister from that state, who first came here to secure a concession for the northern company that his effort was successful, and that it has been the uniform policy of the western powers to secure for all nations the commercial advantages gained in China for any one, you may well believe that the news of this attempt of the Danish company to secure a twenty years' monopoly awakened in the legations at Peking other feelings than mere surprise.

Appreciating the deep interest we may have in laying a line of cable to China via the Hawaiian Islands at no distant day, I hastened to seek an early interview with the Tsung-li Yamên to prevent, if possible, the issuing of an imperial decree, without which this agreement could not bind the government. I met the ministers of the foreign office on the 13th instant. On my asking if it was true, as I had heard, that an agreement giving a certain monopoly to the Northern Telegraph Company had been signed, they profess to have only a general knowledge of the fact. They said they had had no communication from Li Hung Chang, and did not know the details. I expressed my astonishment that they had no official and exact information, as I had the text of the agreement in my pocket. They reiterated the assertion that they had not heard from the viceroy on the subject. But they desired to know what I thought of the plan. I assured them that I was very glad of an opportunity to express my opinion to them. I told them that in one word it was a great mistake, both economically and diplomatically.

First. Just as they were beginning to expand their foreign trade rapidly and sending their own ships to foreign lands, they proposed to give to a company an exclusive privilege, which would enable it to keep a very high tariff for messages and so heavily burden the merchants of China and of foreign lands, who desired to communicate freely with each other.

Secondly. If there is only one line, and that protected as a monopoly, in time of war an enemy might, and probably would, destroy it, and so prevent the government from communicating with its ministers abroad. The United States have indeed made vigorous efforts to bring nations to agree to observe the neutrality of cables in time of war, but so far no such agreement has been reached, and international law does not furnish a protection to the cable. But it is obvious that if there are several lines not protected in this offensive way, the government is much more likely to be able to maintain communication with its representatives in Europe and America.

Thirdly. Such a monopoly as this is sure to be extremely distasteful to all the great foreign powers. Their ministers will doubtless soon confirm what I am saying. Speaking particularly for the United States, I am sure that I can hardly use too strong language in expressing the disapprobation with which this scheme will be regarded by my government. I may venture to remind you that in or about the year 1866, this government gave to Mr. Burlingame permission for Americans to lay a cable from Canton to Tientsin. You can hardly be less generous now than you were then. Furthermore, there are many of your people in the Hawaiian Islands and in the United States, and your trade with us is increasing. It is highly probable that before long American citizens will desire to lay a cable from San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands, and thence to China. Such a line will be a great advantage to you as well as to us. And are you going in this sudden manner to make such an enterprise impossible? I beg you to give the subject your most serious consideration.

His excellency Mao assented warmly to what I said about the war question. His excellency Wang, who at present rather leads in the transaction of business, said he did not see how it would benefit China to have only one company, since probably other companies besides this one would be willing to send government messages gratuitously. If there were no telegraph in China, he added, the government might have something to say. But since the Danes have one line, he did not see why other nations should be denied the same privilege.

Their remarks were somewhat guarded, but the drift of them seemed in harmony with the views I was presenting. In parting Wang said, "We will write to the viceroy and ask about the matter; we have not had a line from him."

The British and German ministers have also communicated with the foreign office on the subject.

I am not without hope that the agreement may fail to secure the approbation of the Emperor.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure in No. 174.]

1. The Chinese Government guarantees to the Great Northern Telegraph Company exclusive monopoly of their submarine cables already landed on Chinese territory. Should the company desire to land other cables in China, the permission of the Chinese Government must first be asked and obtained. Within a period of twenty years from date the Chinese Government will not allow any other person to land telegraph cables in the entire empire including all the foreign settlements and Formosa.

2. Within the same period of twenty years the Chinese Government will not construct or permit others to construct submarine cables or telegraph lines by land in opposition to any of the company's cables in China. Where there is no competition with the interests of the company the Chinese Government will build lines at their pleasure.

3. Should the Chinese Government in future decide upon establishing new telegraph lines, preference will be given to the Great Northern Telegraph Company to do the work for the government, providing their terms are lower than those of competitors.

4. The Chinese foreign office and the two superintendents of trade for the southern and northern ports shall be entitled for a period of twenty years to exchange telegrams with the Chinese ministers and consuls-general residing abroad free of charges on the Great Northern Telegraph Company's cables in China, Japan, and Europe.

Whenever such telegrams pass over other lines not belonging to the company the Chinese Government pays all charges payable to these lines and also whatever besides the company has to pay to other administrations.

All such official telegrams must be authenticated by the seal of the official sender of the same, otherwise they will be charged for in full.

5. The company's cables being connected with foreign countries by two routes, namely, a southern, via Hong-Kong, and a northern, via Japan and Russia, the Chinese Government guarantees that when land lines have been established in China all telegrams to foreign countries handed in by the public and emanating from these lines shall, if not otherwise directed by the sender, be transmitted by the northern route.

6. In case of dispute hereafter the Chinese text will be guiding.

No. 176.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, June 20, 1881. (Received August 1.)

SIR: In my No. 149 of April 30, I submitted for your consideration some interesting and important questions concerning the jurisdiction over foreigners in the Chinese customs service. These questions had been suggested by the trial of a British subject, Mr. Page, for shooting a Chinaman, who was engaged in smuggling. Mr. Page has left the customs service. Meantime the inspector-general of customs, Mr. Hart, who studiously avoids as a rule all diplomatic embarrassments of the customs service, has made some regulations for his subordinates, which will greatly diminish, if not altogether remove, the chances of serious trouble concerning the jurisdiction over foreigners employed under him.

I am not permitted to furnish you the circular containing the new rules. But Mr. Hart has read it to me, and I can properly give you the substance of the regulations. It is ordered that if any foreign employé of the Chinese customs kills or wounds any person, he shall at once resign his place and report to the consul of his nationality, within whose jurisdiction he resides. If the consul tries and convicts him, his resignation is to be permanent. If the consul acquits him or decides that there is no cause for trial, the employé may resume his official position with full pay during the time since his resignation.

The consul, it will be observed, may still profitably have some instructions to guide him in determining whether there is cause for trial; whether, for instance, the fact that the killing or wounding was done in the course of official duty should exempt a man from trial.

No. 168.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 186.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 16, 1881. (Received September 3.)

SIR: On the morning of June 20, I mailed to you my dispatch No. 174, which informed you of the attempt of the Northern Telegraph Company to secure for twenty years the exclusive right to land telegraphic cables in China.

On the afternoon of that day I had business at the foreign office, and learned that the ministers had received from Li Hung Chang an answer to the letter of inquiry which, agreeably to their promise to me, they had sent to him. They said they would send the answer to me, but they evidently preferred not to discuss the main subject until I had read the viceroy's letter. I therefore contented myself with again expressing the conviction that my government would be most strongly opposed to the scheme.

Soon after I received a communication from Prince Kung, embodying evidently only a portion of the viceroy's letter. I inclose a copy. The viceroy's statements are somewhat obscure. He wishes to leave the impression that an agreement has not been drawn; but surely the paper which I inclosed in No. 174 is an agreement, and I have no doubt of its genuineness. The viceroy's words seem to indicate that he is perhaps conscious of having gone too fast and too far before consulting the Imperial Government. He would apparently have us understand that no promise has been made beyond that of the privilege of exclusive connection with the new land line from Shanghai to Tientsin. Yet, at once and inconsistently, he pleads the examples of France and Russia in making concessions as precedents for the monopoly proposed here. It is possible that by making extracts from his paper injustice has been done to it. But it does not seem frank and ingenuous as given to me.

For certain reasons, and especially for the reason that the British and German ministers were conferring with the ministers on the subject, I delayed further discussion upon the matter until July 13.

I began my interview on that day by saying that I found the viceroy's words somewhat obscure, and begged the ministers to inform me exactly what is the request of the telegaph company. With their usual reluctance to convey information until they see that you have it, they said at first that they did not know exactly, since the viceroy had carried on the business without consulting them. But when I drew the agreement from my pocket and asked if it did not distinctly forbid an American company to land a cable in China for twenty years, they confessed that it did. They then asked me to repeat my objections to the plan, which I did at length. After a prolonged conversation they said if I would send them my views in writing they would send them to the viceroy and ask him to modify the scheme in such a manner as not to preclude us from laying a cable. They assured me that they did not wish to give offense to the United States.

I do not report my remarks, because the substance of them is found in the communication to Prince Kung, which, in compliance with the request of the ministers, I have sent in. I inclose a copy.

There were present at the interview their excellencies Mao, Wang, Ch'ung, and Hsia. I have of course had to proceed entirely without instructions in this business, but trust my action may meet with the approval of the Department. I cannot venture to predict the result.

Informal.] JULY 2, 1881.

On the 13th June, your excellency came to this office and spoke about an agreement having been entered into between the Great Northern Telegraph Company and the viceroy Li, by which the said company were to enjoy a twenty years' monopoly during which time no other company would be allowed to land telegraph cables in China, &c.

This office thereupon wrote to inquire of the viceroy Li, and an answer has been received from him, in which he says:

"According to international law among western nations, railways, telegraphs, etc., are matters about which each nation can do as it pleases; either the country builds them itself or allows public companies to build them. The line of telegraph which last year it was proposed to establish between Shanghai and Tientsin was designed with a view to having direct and rapid communication with the outside world, remembering this we cannot do otherwise than negotiate with the Great Northern Telegraph Company to connect our line with their cable The said company has done its utmost to assist us honestly in purchasing materials and hiring workmen to build this first line, and has begged for (a similar understanding) like the terms of the agreement made between the company and the Governments of France and Russia. There appears to be no reason why the request should not be granted. The company have only begged me to grant their request, but have not asked that an agreement be drawn. I find nothing in all this that is contrary to international law of western nations. I herewith forward for your inspection translations of the agreements between the Great Northern Telegraph Company and the Governments of France and Russia. (It will be seen that) the agreement with Russia is for a period of thirty years, and that with France for a period of twenty-five years. In this instance, it is only for the Shanghai cable that a twenty years' (monopoly) has been granted. It is not I who have made the precedent," &c.

It will be seen that in managing this business the viceroy has made rules fixing a limitation in years, like what Russia and France have already done. It behooves us to send copies of the agreement between the Great Northern Telegraph Company and France and Russia for your excellency's inspection.

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

JULY 16, 1881.

YOUR IMPERIAL HIGHNESS: A few weeks ago I received a copy of an agreement which the Northern Telegraph Company ask His Imperial Majesty's Government to make, forbidding any person or corporation, except the northern company, to land a telegraph cable anywhere in the empire for a period of twenty years.

I have had three interviews with the ministers of the foreign office on the subject, and have received from them one communication embodying certain statements of the viceroy Li with whom the company seem to have carried on their negotiations. The ministers have now asked me to state in writing my objections to the proposed scheme, and I therefore submit this paper in compliance with their request. The first two articles of the agreement in my copy read as follows:

"1st. The Chinese Government guarantees to the Great Northern Telegraph Company exclusive monopoly of their submarine cables already landed in Chinese territory. Should the company desire to land other cables in China, the permission of the Chinese Government must first be asked and obtained. Within a period of twenty years from date the Chinese Government will not allow any other person to land telegraph cables in the entire empire, including all foreign settlements and Formosa.

"2d. Within the same period of twenty years the Chinese Government will not construct, or permit others to construct, submarine cables or telegraph lines by land in opposition to any of the company's cables in China. Where there is no competition with the interests of the company the Chinese Government will build lines at their pleasure." Now, in regard to these articles pemit me to say:

I. I trust I shall not be deemed obtrusive if I express the opinion that the proposed arrangement is of very doubtful expediency for China herself, and for three reasons:

1st. Although the United States have made earnest efforts to have ocean cables "neutralized" in case of war so that they shall not be disturbed, the efforts have not been successful. In case of war between some western nation and Denmark or China, the northern company's lines might be destroyed, and China would lose telegraphic connection with the world. But if other lines are laid, China might through some one of them be able to keep up communication with her ministers abroad and with all nations.

2d. By the second article China cuts herself off from constructing land lines to Foo-Chow, Canton, and other points in the south which she may very much need, especially if the northern cable is injured in war. China thus pays too high a price for the trifling advantage she gains of sending dispatches free to her ministers and consuls.

3d. All experience has shown that monopolies for long periods are subject to great abuses, and tend to create much ill-feeling.

It is only in exceptional cases that it is found wise to grant them. I respectfully submit that the cases mentioned in the extracts from the viceroy's letter are so different from this that they ought not to be considered as precedents for a request like that now made. The submarine line from France to Denmark cannot be practically a monopoly, because the countries are connected through Germany by land lines. The Russian concession was for a line in a very remote region where the risk of loss was great, and where no company perhaps would venture to build a line without a guarantee for a reasonable period that it should have an exclusive privilege.

But surely the case is very different here where it is proposed to cut off the United States and even China herself from building lines, which may be in the highest degree important to China in order to guarantee returns to a company which is understood to be already very richly remunerated by its business.

II. But speaking especially on behalf of the United States, I am certain that I cannot use too strong language to express the disappointment and regret, I had almost said the sense of injustice which my government will feel if His Imperial Majesty's Government shall bind itself in such terms that no American company can lay a cable within twenty years from our country to your shores, when a Danish company is allowed an unrestricted privilege of telegraphic communication with Europe.

Fifteen years ago, in 1866, Mr. Burlingame, has recorded in our archives, the ministers gave him a verbal permission for an American company to lay a cable along the coast. I cannot think that His Majesty's Government will now be less liberal in its policy.

Even if the government thinks it wise to give the northern company the monopoly for the connection with Europe, there seems no reason for forbidding a line from America, which can in no proper sense be considered as a competing line with the European. The messages to America do indeed have to be sent now by the northern line. But the expense of sending by that line is so great that the business is only a small part of the entire business of the line, and only a small part of what should be given to a direct line to America.

His Majesty's Government surely cannot forget that a considerable number of his subjects are now resident in the Sandwich Islands, and many more in America. Moreover, enterprising Chinese merchants are beginning to send steamships to America and to enlarge their business. Every year the commercial relations of the two nations are becoming more important. It is of the greatest consequence to the fostering of this commerce so useful to both nations that the largest facilities be afforded for postal and telegraphic intercourse, both for individuals and for the governments.

It must be known to your imperial highness that the United States have long been engaged in making soundings to determine the best line for a telegraph across the Pacific Ocean. A great deal has already been expended in making the necessary investigations. It has never so much as occurred to our government that His Majesty's Government would refuse to us the privilege granted to the Danish company of landing the cable, if an American company should, to the great advantage of both countries, incur the enormous expense of laying a line of probably more than 22,000 li, for such would be the length of a line laid from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, Japan, and Shanghai.

I must, therefore, most respectfully urge that no plan be adopted by His Imperial Majesty's Government which will prevent an American company from landing a cable at Shanghai. I cannot too earnestly and too emphatically make known to you in advance the force with which, in my opinion, my government will remonstrate against so marked a discrimination in favor of the Danish company to the exclusion of an American company which may propose to lay a line where the Danish company has never proposed to lay one, namely, between America and China. I trust, therefore, that whatever concessions are made to the Northern Telegraph Company, His Imperial Majesty's Government will not, in any way, bind itself to forbid the landing of a cable from America or the transmission of messages from such a cable over any of the inland lines which may be constructed in China.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 190.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 28, 1881. (Received September 19.)

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you some correspondence between Mr. Vice-Consul Carrow and myself concerning the refusal of a district magistrate at Canton to stamp the deeds of two lots of land purchased by the Rev. E. Z. Simmons for the Southern Baptist Mission.

You will observe by perusing the vice-consuls dispatch (copy inclosed) that the magistrate refuses to stamp the deeds because, as he alleges, first, foreigners have no right to hold lands outside the foreign concessions, and secondly, Mr. Simmons has no right to buy for the society. Now, it is notorious that the missionaries have for years owned and occupied estates outside the foreign concession. It is also well known that the clause inserted in the twelfth article of the British treaty of Tientsin, 1858, authorizing the purchase of property "in other places" than the open ports, was placed there with special reference to the unreasonable opposition which had been made at Canton to securing convenient places of business and residence.

It is also true, I believe, that there is no shadow of any ground in any treaty for asserting that Mr. Simmons may not buy for his missionary society if he can buy at all. This claim of the magistrate probably arises from the fact that the French Roman Catholics, in order to secure real estate in the interior for missionary purposes, do purchase in the name of the society or church of Chinese converts.

This action of the district magistrate does not wear a pleasant aspect. It may be simply the fruit of a superserviceable zeal of a new incumbent of the office. But there are some indications that the authorities of Kwangtung are just now inclined to a rather reactionary policy in the treatment of foreigners. The viceroy has shown a reluctance to accept the regulations concerning official intercourse. I have reason to believe that the provincial authorities have embarrassed the Roman Catholics not a little during the last few months. I have deemed it our right under the treaties, and in every way expedient, to instruct our consular officer to take a firm position. I inclose a copy of my dispatch to him. Trusting my course may meet your approbation,

No. 16.] JULY 5, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for your decision the following case:

Rev. E. Z. Simmons, an American missionary, acting for the American Southern Baptist Mission, bought of two Chinamen (Wong Hoy Chow and Ngai Tai Shing) two lots of ground adjoining each other, on which to erect a dwelling-house. These lots of ground are situated on the river side, outside the city walls, and in the immediate neighborhood of other houses owned and occupied by missionaries. The deeds to this ground, this office has forwarded to the Nam Hoi magistrate, through his excellency the viceroy, for the magistrate's stamp and verification as is usual in such cases. He declines to stamp them for the following reasons:

"That Shameen, the foreign concession being the "open port of Canton," these lots are therefore in the interior, and China's treaty with the United States does not allow Americans to buy land in the interior. That his predecessors in office have committed grave errors in stamping and verifying deeds to property which are now held by foreigners in different parts of the city."

Even should foreigners have the right to buy property in Canton, outside of Shameen, he contends that these particular deeds are not proper ones for verification, because the Reverend Simmons' name is mentioned in them, and that they should read the Baptist Mission buys, &c., instead of the Rev. Simmons buys for the American Baptist Mission," &c.

I have the honor therefore to submit to your excellency these two points, viz: Can Americans buy property in Canton without Shameen? In other words, what is to be considered the "open port of Canton?" Second, are these deeds in proper form, and if not, how should they be worded? I may say that the Nam Hoi admits the parties selling the land are the lawful owners.

I am, &c.,

F. CARROW.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 190.]

Mr. Angell to Mr. Carrow.

No. 27.] JULY 27, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your No. 16, in which you inform me that the Nam Hoi magistrate declines to stamp the deeds of two lots of land purchased by the Rev. E. Z. Simmons, an American citizen, acting for the American Southern Baptist Mission. These lots lie on the river, outside the city walls, but near to houses which missionaries have been heretofore permitted to purchase, and which they now occupy.

The magistrate justifies his action on two grounds:

First. That the treaties between the United States and China do not allow our citizens to buy land beyond the walls of the port of Canton.

Secondly. That even if this is not the right view of the treaties, still Mr. Simmons has no right to buy in his own name for the mission society.

I cannot refrain from an expression of surprise that the magistrate should suddenly depart from the example of his predecessors, when, so far as appears, the occupancy by other foreigners of the land, in the vicinity of which Mr. Simmons has purchased has wrought no harm to Chinese interests.

But furthermore, his action is not sustained by the treaties. Article XII of the British treaty of Tientsin, 1858, says:

"British subjects, whether at the ports or at other places, desiring to build or open houses, warehouses, churches, hospitals, or burial grounds, shall make their agreement for the land or buildings they require at the rates prevailing among the people, equitably, and without exaction on either side."

Article XXX of our treaty of Tientsin, 1858, gives us all the rights and privileges of other nations.

Now, without desiring to give to this expression "at other places" too wide a meaning it is clear that it means something. I believe it is historically true that it was inserted by the British especially because of the restrictions to which foreigners had been subjected in obtaining land in Canton. Now, when our citizens and other foreigners have under this article been justly and peaceably occupying land just outside the walls of Canton for many years, and the authorities have by silence virtually admitted that such occupancy was lawful, we have a right to protest, as we must most vigorously, against such action as this of the Nam Hoi magistrate.

But, in the second place, the magistrate may be safely challenged to show a line or a word in any treaty in support of his second point. If Mr. Simmons has, as I maintain he has, a right to purchase at all in the place described, he has a perfect right to buy for the society, or to buy in his own right, as he may choose. I cannot imagine on what ground the magistrate can rest his argument. If this is the only alleged error in the form of the deeds, we cannot admit that it is an error.

You will, therefore, please communicate the substance of this dispatch to the magistrate, and renew the request that the deeds be stamped, and in case the magistrate persists in his refusal, you will carry the case to the viceroy, and if necessary in the end send it up here again that it may be presented to the Tsung-li Yamên.

No. 198.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 15, 1881. (Received October 3.)

SIR: During the year I have had some reports of petty depredations upon the property of American missionaries at Teng Chow Foo, in the province of Shantung. But the missionary who has given me the information has not been without hope that the local magistrates could be brought to administer justice without being warned by the imperial authorities.

But this hope proving vain, another of the missionaries, Rev. Charles R. Mills, sent me a formal communication reciting in detail the depredations which had been committed, and invoking my assistance. The substance of his letter is given in a communication which I at once addressed to Prince Kung, asking him to urge the local authorities to punish the thieves, to secure the return of the value of the property taken or destroyed, and to guard more vigilantly against depredations in the future.

I inclose a copy of the prince's reply, in which he assures me that instructions have been given to the local authorities in compliance with my request, and also of a later communication from him embodying a report from the Taotai of Teng-Lai-Ching.

I have, &c.,

JULY 14, 1881.

I have from time to time heard from American missionaries resident at Teng Chow Foo, in Shantung, of injury done to their property by lawless persons, and of their inability to get justice done by the magistrates to the guilty parties. But I have refrained from troubling you about the matters in the hope that the local authorities would in the end take proper action. But as they seem to be inefficient, I am constrained to write you.

According to a statement sent me by the Rev. Mr. Mills, the following facts appear:

For several years one of the missionaries has lost by thefts articles, especially clothes, and a clock from the buildings connected with his school. An American lady, residing on East street has had $30 in copper cash stolen from her house. In the winter of 1879–'80 the house of one of our missionaries was set on fire in the night by robbers who were trying to force an iron safe. About $20 worth of clothing was then consumed. In all these cases application was made to the local authorities for redress, but in vain.

In January last thieves entered the missionary church and took two clocks, valued at $18, two lamps worth $4, and an organ-cover valued at $1.

The total value of the articles taken in these depredations, so far as it can be correctly estimated, is $73.

About April 1 Mr. Mills sent to the prefect a statement, a copy of which I inclose. He promised to urge the district magistrate to do his duty and secure the restoration of the property. But so far as known he has done nothing.

May I ask you to urge upon the local authorities to punish the thieves, to secure the return of the value of property taken, and to guard more vigilantly against such depredations in the future?

PEKING, July 22, 1881.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication in reply:

I have had the honor to receive your excellency's dispatch of July 14, reporting cases of robberies from American missionaries at Teng Chow fu in Shantung. You give an estimate of the value of the stolen goods, and inclose a copy of the missionaries' petition to the prefect, and you request me to order the local authorities to take rigorous steps for the arrest of the thieves, and to guard more vigilantly against such depredations in the future.

This office has sent a copy of your communication to the governor of Shantung, requesting him to instruct the local officers to inquire carefully into these cases of robbery, to arrest the robbers, and recover the stolen property.

Pending the receipt of a reply to our communication, when we will again write you, we send this dispatch for your excellency's information.

PEKING, August 10, 1881.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication:

Referring to your excellency's dispatch anent the depredations committed upon the property of missionaries at Teng Chow fu, we have further to state that we have received a representation from the taotai of Teng Lai Ching, in which he says:

"The district magistrate had informed me some time since that the Rev. Messrs. Wherry and Mateer had complained of robberies from their premises. I ordered him (the magistrate) to send detectives after the thieves, but many days elapsed and they were not apprehended, nor was the property recovered. Having now received the Yamên's dispatch, I have again ordered the magistrate to take up these cases and make rigorous search for the culprits, appointing a time within which they are to be apprehended and dealt with."

We send the purport of the Taotai dispatch for your excellency's information.

Washington, August 16, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 20th of June last, No. 176, in regard to certain regulations lately promulgated by Mr. Hart, the superintendent of customs, has been received.

The regulation, the substance of which you give in your dispatch, namely, that if any foreign employé of the Chinese customs kills or wounds any person, he shall at once resign his place and report to the consul of his nationality within whose jurisdiction he resides, and that if the consul acquits him or decides that there is no cause for trial, such employé may resume his station with full pay during the time since his resignation, appears to be a just and reasonable one.

If in such a case the consul found that the employé killed or wounded a man in the discharge of his official duty, and under such circumstances as that he, if tried by a Chinese tribunal, be held guiltless, or such as would, under the laws of the United States, make the act justifiable or excusable, it would be the duty of the consul to discharge him. It would be difficult, and, indeed, inexpedient, to attempt to specify what the precise character of the circumstances should be that would warrant such acquittal by the consul. Each case must be determined by its own facts and res gesta.

No. 172.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 199.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 18, 1881. (Received October 3.)

SIR: I regret to have to report a somewhat serious disturbance of the work of American Presbyterian missionaries in Tsi-nan-fu, the capital of the province of Shantung. The interior of a building which they had purchased and were fitting for use as a chapel, was destroyed by a mob and the lives of the missionaries and their families were threatened. Happily the intervention of the authorities, though apparently somewhat tardy, soon secured safety from personal danger.

I first received information of the principal facts through Mr. Vice-Consul Fisher, of Tientsin, late in the afternoon of July 29. He had received them through Rev. Mr. Pilcher, an American missionary at Tientsin, to whom a Chinese messenger had come from the missionaries at Tsi-nan-fu. A little later on the same day I received a letter from the missionaries themselves, Rev. John Murray and Rev. Stephen A. Hunter, M. D., reciting the facts in detail, and submitting to me certain questions which they wished me to answer for their guidance. I inclose a copy. On the next day I hastened to address a communication to Prince Kung, an extract from which I inclose.

As is usually the case, this disturbance was fomented by the literati and gentry. Although the missionaries say they have no complaint to make of the Taotai, I have called Prince Kung's attention to what I deem his delinquency. He could certainly have prevented the tumult with the same force which he used to suppress it.

The missionaries, though young men, seem to have acted with much discretion.

The first of the four questions presented by them to me raises one of the most delicate points in the relation of missionaries to the government, namely, by what right do foreigners hold real property in the interior. I think the answer I have given is the correct one.

In respect to the fourth question as to the right of demanding the release of the Chinaman who had acted as intermediary in procuring the property, I did not see that anything could be asked under Article XXIX of our treaty of Tientsin, since it does not appear that he was punished for his Christian faith. On the other hand, as we have no treaty right to acquire property in Tsi-nan-fu, we could hardly intercede with a demand for his release, on the ground that the authorities were obstructing our citizens in the exercise of a right guaranteed by treaty, as we have felt justified in doing when Chinamen have been punished for leasing or selling us lands in an open port.

I have received a reply from Prince Kung, in which, after quoting my dispatch at length, he says, "We have sent the purport of it to the governor of Shantung, directing him to order his subordinates to take up the case and deal with it justly."

I at once informed the missionaries of the nature of the prince's communication.

Meantime the missionaries wrote me again on August 6, giving some further particulars of the situation. I inclose a copy of their letter, and also of my reply.

On the 16th instant I conferred with the foreign office on this disturbance. I gave them the names of the two principal instigators of the mob, and urged that the missionaries ought to be allowed to have an eligible site on the main street. They said, what I have no donbt is true, that the location of the chapel by the side of the examination hall was calculated to excite opposition, but they added that the governor was desirious of reaching a peaceful adjustment of the difficulties.

I think there is reason to hope that the missionaries will have no further serious trouble, though possibly they may not secure premises exactly in the location which they would prefer.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 199.]

Messrs. Murray and Hunter to Mr. Angell.

We, the missionaries in Chi-nan-fu, capital of Shantung province, being citizens of the United States, and having the usual passports, desire to make a statement of certain difficulties which have arisen from the purchase of property in this city. The main facts are the following:

1st. A property suitable for a chapel was bought on the main street of the city during the month of January, 1881.

2d. Peaceable possession of the same was given during the month of May, and the buildings put under contract for repairs.

3d. Upon the 13th of July the house was attacked by a mob led by the teachers or sien shangs from the Shu Yuan Yamên, and remained in the hands of the populace until taken possession of by a body of soldiers from the Yamên.

4th. The property has been given up by us upon condition that the authorities furnish us a suitable location elsewhere.

5th. The public excitement and popular outbreak has caused our lives and that of the native Christians to be placed in imminent danger.

Therefore, we now present the whole case to you, our national representatives, and ask for advice and direction concerning the proposed change of property, and, if need be, also, for protection of our lives and persons.

In order that you may be able more perfectly to understand the whole matter, we herewith subjoin a statement in detail of all the circumstances connected with this difficulty.

During the autumn of 1880, Rev. J. S. McIlvaine, a former member of this mission, but now deceased, entered into negotiation on behalf of the mission for the purchase of the aforesaid property. This property is one of the most eligible positions in the whole city for our purpose, being upon the west end of the main street, near our former rented chapel and connected with all our former work. It is situated by the side of the "Shu Yuan Yamên" and the ground is said to have formerly belonged to the same. The purchase price agreed upon was 3,750 taels. On the 19th of January, 1881, the sum of 3,100 taels having been paid, the titles were transferred, the balance to be paid upon possession.

Owing to the difficulties in the way of a foreigner purchasing property in the interior, one of our church members, Lui Yü Ting by name, agreed to purchase the property in his own right, and afterwards deed it to the church. The title which the former owner, Tsiao Tung Hing, made to Lui Yü Ting was duly signed, witnessed, and attested by the customary feast, Lui Yü Ting upon his part made a title to the church for public use. But this, one of the neighbors refused to sign and it was held by us simply as an evidence against the exclusive ownership of Lui Yü Ting. This title, however, does not properly form a part of the present case, as Lui Yü Ting does not deny his trusteeship.

The old titles furnished us extend over a period of eighty years, and the property is commonly reported to have had consecutive owners for two centuries. None of the titles, however, have the usual red stamp upon them as the property is "meé liang ti." Whether the same distinction obtains in other provinces or not is unknown to us, but as ordinarily explained, it has reference to certain laws, the owners of which were favored by the present dynasty upon its accession to the throne, and the lands were subjected only to a nominal tax. Much land is so held in this city. The owners' names are registered in the Ch'eng Shon Ying Ts'an Fu, and each owner receives a yearly tax receipt with the official stamp, upon payment of dues. When the property was bought the name of Lui Yü Ting was registered as its present owner, and upon payment of tax the usual receipt was given.

It is now claimed that these deeds are false, but the subsequent offer of the authorities to furnish us another location is a virtual concession that our title is valid.

We were put in peaceable possession of the property on the 19th of May and entered into a contract for certain repairs, for which we were to pay the sum of 1,300,000 small cash, and the carpenters to have the old material, the value of which was rated at 200,000 small cash (the whole sum being about $700 of our money). The building was to be repaired according to native plans and style of architecture, and every effort was made to avoid collision with the people. The repairing proceeded in peace for about three weeks. On the 12th of July we were informed by friends that on the following day an attack would be made upon the building and the workmen stopped. Having received this information we proceeded to the Taotai's Yamên and asked for a proclamation to preserve peace. The officer assured us that he would keep the peace and that no trouble should occur. The next day, 13th, we, ourselves, ordered the workmen to cease in apprehension of difficulty. About 9 o'clock a. m. the house was attacked by a mob led by the sien shangs from the Shu Yuon.

The Taotai was at that time in the Shu Yuan counseling with the officers, and we are informed that the teachers acted in defiance of the orders of their superior. After the teachers left the building it was in the hands of the mob, who severely beat one of the head workmen, and destroyed everything movable, carrying off money, valuable papers, &c. Late in the day the property was taken possession of by the soldiery.

During the same day our Christian Lui Yü Ting was taken to the fu Yamên, beaten, and cast into prison, where he still remains, despite our earnest endeavors for his release.

Late in the day we sought an interview with the governor, but were not able to obtain it. On the morning of the 14th we saw the governor in presence of four other officials, whom it seems he had invited to hear the case. After a lengthy consultation we agreed to give up the house we had purchased, upon condition we were furnished another on the west end of the main street. This they refused to promise, offering to refund us the purchased price and damages. They also offered to assist us in buying a house whenever we could find one. These terms we would not accede to, but demanded another house in exchange. This they would not promise to furnish, saying they would consider the matter and give us word. But the governor promised to issue a proclamation affording us protection, and ordered the fu officer not to beat or further oppress our Christian now in confinement.

On the evening of the same day the proclamation was sent us, but it was not satisfactory, as it only quoted the words of the treaty, and made no mention whatever to the present circumstances. We returned it through the Taotai, and the next day, 15th, it was again sent us; this time in a more satisfactory form.

It was posted upon the gates of the city and upon our dwellings.

On the 16th the talk on the streets was alarming. The death of all the foreigners and native Christians was threatened, and the 17th was said to be the day on which it was to be carried into execution. A notice had been previously posted in public places calling the scholars of the province together upon that day to confer concerning the property we had bought; and the lower classes, taking this for a threat, were ripe for a mob.

In the evening of the same day we informed the Taotai of this increasing turbulence and asked for soldiers to guard our premises. This was promised. Upon the morning of the 17th, our position was apparently critical. No soldiers had yet arrived; and, relying upon our passports, in the early dawn we took protection in the Taotai's Yamên. The authorities then took precautions to avoid an outbreak, and in the evening of the same day we returned to our homes.

Since that time the city has been quieter, and the Taotai and other officials, invited by the governor to hear the case, have held several consultations, at which we have been present, and they have promised to furnish us another location and make good all our losses. But they insist that it is impossible to find a place upon the main street.

We are willing to concede much for the sake of peace, but we are not willing to be put in a corner. A chapel for daily preaching would be of little use unless upon the main street, west of the center of the city. And as the purpose of Mr. McIlvaine, the original donor of the purchase money, was to have a street chapel, we have no right to accept of any location unsuitable for such purpose. We have no complaint to make against the officials, as the governor and Taotai seem well disposed towards us. But it has been a difficult case for them to manage, because the scholars have disregarded their authority, and they cannot be dealt with as the lower classes. We only fear that we will be trifled with from day to day, and this matter, for an indefinite period, remains unsettled. Therefore we have presented the whole case to you, and await your advice and direction. We would especially ask for information concerning the following points:

1st. Have we, or not, a right to demand a house upon the main street, west end, when we are giving up the best location upon that street and the best in the whole city for our work?

2d. In case a house is offered us at an exorbitant price, what remedy have we to avoid imposition except refusing to take the place?

3d. Is the name of the Presbyterian church, which is used in the former deed, "Chang lao hui yeh su chiao tang" a sufficient title to enable foreigners, as well as natives, to control the property?

4th. Have we, or not, grounds for demanding the release of Lui Yü Ting, our native Christian, inasmuch as he only acted for the church in buying the property? In regard to these, and any other points which seem to you to arise out of this case, we respectfully ask and await your advice.

Hoping that the whole matter may be brought to a peaceful and satisfactory conclusion through your kind intervention,

We have the honor, &c.,

JOHN MURRAY.

JULY 30, 1881.

GENTLEMEN: Your communication of the 20th instant reached me last evening. It is with deep sympathy and with great regret that I hear of the violent interference with your missionary work. But I am relieved to learn from you that you and your families are probably safe from personal harm. The attitude of the governor furnishes assurance of your safety. An hour before I received your letter, I had heard from Bev. Mr. Pilcher, through our consul at Tientsin, that perhaps your lives were in peril.

You do not state what is the alleged objection to your occupancy of the premises you had secured. But from what I have heard of similar disturbances, I presume that your proximity to the Shu Yuan was offensive to those who wished to make you trouble. I am satisfied that it is generally advisable to choose for missionary work, especially in a city where there is any spirit of opposition to missionary labor, a site not too near any important official residence. The choice of a site near a Yamên is pleaded as an excuse, if it is not the real reason, for insisting on a change of place.

I am not sufficiently familiar with the laws and usages in Shantung to decide whether there is any technical flaw in the deeds. But the presumption is that they are valid, since the authorities seem to recognize your title to the property by offering to compensate you for it with money or with other land.

Your course during the trouble seems to me to have been very judicious. I am glad that you did not leave the city and also that you promptly offered to exchange your premises for some other eligible site. You showed courage in insisting on your right to remain and a proper spirit of conciliation in respect to the property.

You request me to give for your guidance answers to four questions.

"1st. Have we or not a right to demand a house upon the main street, west end," &c.

It must be confessed that we have very slender ground, if any, for demanding permission to purchase real property at any interior city like Chinan-fu. The British treaty of 1858, article 12, does indeed read thus:

"British subjects, whether at the ports or at other places, desiring to build or open houses, warehouses, churches, hospitals, or burial grounds, shall make their agreement for the land or buildings they require at the rate prevailing among the people, equitably, and without exaction on either side."

But that phrase "or at other places" was inserted with reference to situations contiguous to the ports and has been so interpreted.

Our missionaries have been allowed to acquire property in the interior rather on sufferance than by right. They have now so long been indulged that we can make the indulgence a ground for remonstrating against the discontinuance of it, but it is wise for us to proceed with much caution and delicacy. I think we have, strictly speaking, no treaty right to demand a site as our own anywhere in Chi-nan-fu. But from these facts, namely, that in nearly all parts of the empire, missionaries are allowed to procure property; that you and your associates have been so long in your city without giving cause of complaint; that you were allowed without any remonstrance to purchase the property on Main street and pay 3,100 taels, you have strong ground for insisting, and you may properly insist with firmness, that if your premises are taken from you some other eligible site shall be secured to you. I advise you to stand for that until it is clear that you cannot succeed and at any rate until the governor shall have heard from Prince Kung and the Tsung-li Yamên, whom I shall at once address on the whole matter. When I receive an answer from Prince Kung, I shall inform you immediately. He will probably answer me and write to the governor within ten or twelve days.

If all efforts to secure a site where you wish it fail, I would counsel you to take an inferior site rather than leave the city. We may expect that after a time this violence will abate and you can then improve your situation.

2d. In answer to your second question I should say your only remedy against taking a house at an exorbitant price is to refuse it.

3d. In response to your third question I have to say that I suppose the terms Presbyterian Church as used by you can only mean in law the Presbyterian Board of Missions. In that case, I suppose, you missionaries who are its only agents here, must control its property.

4th. In answer to the question whether you have the right to demand the release of Lui Yü Ting, the native Christian, who acted for the church, I reply that you cannot demand it. You can, as his friend, request it, and even urge it; I know of no ground upon which you can do more.

You will have need of patience. But I trust your troubles may be ended without too much delay. You may be assured that this legation will do all in its power to assist you.

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 199.]

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

[After reciting the facts and quoting largely from Messrs. Murray and Hunter's letter, the dispatch proceeds:]

AUGUST 2, 1881.

I have never heard that any complaint was made against our missionaries in Tsi-nan-fu. You will agree with me, I think, that they have showed a proper spirit of conciliation in consenting promptly to make an exchange of their property for some other eligible site.

It is hard that men of such a spirit should be so maltreated. I cannot think the Taotai was as efficient as he should have been. When warned in advance that an attack was to be made upon the building, he did not make proper preparation to prevent it, and when the attack was begun in the morning it was not until late in the afternoon that the soldiers were called out to suppress the mob.

As to the mob and the leaders of it, I trust that your highness will urge the governor to punish the guilty parties.

Furthermore, it seems to me only fair that these peaceable missionaries who have so readily agreed to abandon their chosen site in order to prevent trouble should be met in the same spirit and allowed to have some good position. It is hardly to be credited that on a street nearly two li in length, no place can be found for them. I trust the authorities may assist them to find some site on the west end of the main street.

Finally, while now as always it is only with great delicacy that I refer to the punishment of a Chinese subject by the Chinese authorities, may I not speak a friendly word in behalf of the release of the Christian, Lui Yü Ting, unless he has committed some other offense than acting as the intermediary in the purchase of the property.

Confident that your imperial highness will direct the governor of Shantung to do what is right in the premises,

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

TSI-NAN-FU, August 6, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of July 30 has just come to hand. Allow us to express our warmest thanks for your personal sympathy and interest in our welfare. While as the national representative, the execution of law must be one and the same, it is the source of no little gratification to us that you are so thoroughly in accord with the plans and purposes of mission work.

Before hearing further from you, we send herewith some additional information which may aid you in the prosecution of the case.

1st. The objections to our occupancy of the property bought were rather vaguely stated by the officials. In substance they were (1), unwillingness of the people; (2), proximity to the Shu Yuan; (3), spoiling the Feng Shui, and (4), occupying public ground.

2d. The origin of the difficulty, as we learn now, was mainly with two men; one commonly known as Li Shih-erh, a former governor of Honan. In addition to instigating the riot, he endeavored to deprive us of servants, by threatening to imprison them for aiding the foreigners, and said this plan had succeeded in driving the foreigners from Honan. His conduct has been so violent that it seems proper to make mention of his name. The other man, Yin-shih-fang, a former "chih fu" in Honan, seems to have been also a chief party in stirring up the people. Probably less than a hundred teachers took part in the attack upon the building, but the number of subsequent meetings was undoubtedly much greater.

3d. The officials have already offered us two locations. One of these was entirely unsuitable, being in a very retired location, and was at once refused. The other was inside the East Gate, and this we neither refused nor accepted, saying we had referred the matter to Peking. At a former conference they had pressed us so closely with the question, "If we cannot buy upon the main street, what other location is there most desirable?" That we at that time mentioned two other streets, viz, the south end of the Pu Cheng-tz, and inside the East Gate. But when we learned that three houses were for sale upon the main street, we refused to accept their statement that no houses could be bought there.

We now mention this offer, lest it should be represented that we have already consented to a location inside the East Gate. This we will not accept so long as there is any hope of being placed upon the main street. Should this hope fail us we will then consider other locations. But to leave the main street, where we have had a small rented chapel for a number of years, will necessitate a change of all our plans, and change the base of all our work.

Our hope of being placed upon the main street was not that we had any right a priori to demand a location there, but being already located there, that we should not be displaced. We had paid the full amount of purchase money, taels 3,750, and had been in peaceable possession for more than six weeks before the riot.

4th. So far as we can learn our native Christian Lui Yu Ting was beaten as much because he was a Christian, as because he purchased the property for us. Many of the questions asked him referred to his faith, and when he answered he was beaten. While we are aware that, as a general rule, we have no right to interfere with the native government in its punishment of its own subjects, yet it seems to us that, in this case, the rights guaranteed to native Christians have been infringed upon. The reason given us, however, by the "fu" officer for his punishment, was that he had deceived us (the foreigners) by selling us public land. Since we last wrote his condition in prison has been materially improved. But owing to the uncertain length of time that the case may be delayed in the courts we are anxious that he be released upon our bond which was formerly refused.

Presenting this additional statement of facts, we await the opinion of the Tsung-li Yamên, being assured that our case will be well and ably presented.

The city is now comparatively quiet, and we see little danger of further trouble.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN MURRAY,
STEPHEN HUNTER.

AUGUST 15, 1881.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of August 6 reached me last evening. I was glad to hear that no new disturbances had occurred.

I shall report the names of the two prominent instigators of the troubles to the Tsung-li Yamên.

The ground on which you are pressing your request for a position on the west part of the main street is reasonable, and I should not readily abandon it.

As to the case of Lui Yü Ting, I answered you as I did, because I supposed they would not admit that they were punishing him for his religious belief, much less formally charge him with Christian faith as an offense. If they do admit that, or if it can be shown clearly that such is the fact, then you have the right as his friends to ask that he have the protection guaranteed by the treaty. While I have no expectation that they will concede that they are punishing him because of his Christianity, I will quote for you the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Tientsin, 1858, that you may use it if they should make any such concession or if you can prove the fact. Article XXIX (quoted.)

I inclose you also a copy of the same in China.

I thank you for your too kind appreciation of the little I have been able to do for you. If it is my duty to aid you, it is still more a pleasure.

No. 173.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 201.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 18, 1881. (Received October 3.)

SIR: In my No. 186, I inclosed a copy of a communication to Prince Kung, stating, in compliance with the request of the ministers of the foreign office, my objections to the proposed concessions to the Northern Telegraph Company. That communication was sent in on July 17.

Having occasion to visit the foreign office on July 29 on other business, I took occasion to ask if they had received from the viceroy any reply to my communication which they had forwarded to him. They said they had, and that there was no intention of preventing the landing of a cable from America. When I asked whether there would be any obstacle to landing a cable which should touch at Japan, they hesitated, but expressed the opinion that the viceroy would arrange for that in some way. They promised to send me a paper upon the subject.

After waiting more than a week, I sent Mr. Taylor, acting interpreter, to inquire when I could expect the promised paper and to explain my desire for it by assuring them of the profound interest my government feels on the subject. The next day I received the communication, a copy of which I inclose.

I think you, will agree with me in the opinion that it is a feeble, shuffling evasive, and entirely unsatisfactory document. Nothing could be more unworthy of the viceroy's vigorous mind than the passage extracted from his letter.

I may properly say in this connection that while awaiting this reply from the Tsung-li Yamên, I had the statement from one of the telegraph company's officers that the Tsung-li Yamên assented to the monopoly scheme before the viceroy entered into it. They assured me at the outset that the viceroy made the arrangement without consulting them. I am sorry to believe that there has been a deal of prevarication somewhere in this business.

Deeming it desirable to commit the ministers on paper to whatever they are willing to promise, I addressed to Prince Kung a series of questions, which I inclose. A reply, which I inclose, was sent me on the 14th inst.

The whole agreement for which I had asked was not sent to me, but only the second article, which the viceroy said he feared had been mistranslated. When I say that the article was exactly as I had it in my copy, further comment on this part of the transaction seems unnecessary.

My question whether the agreement has received imperial sanction is evaded, but I am informed that the viceroy has sanctioned it.

The answers to my third and fourth questions amount to this, that when an American company wishes to lay a line from America to China, "an arrangement" can be made for the line, but the foreign office cannot inform me what that arrangement is to be.

My question as to whether if the viceroy Li promises to make an arrangement for the American cable, his successor will be bound by the promise in case of the viceroy's death—a question which the prince criticises—was asked because all through our interviews and correspondence the ministers have carried the idea that Li Hung Chang had managed the business with the Northern Telegraph Company, and would see to it in some way that a door was left open for an American cable to enter China. As the language used about "an arrangement" has been so vague, it is quite possible that a successor of Li Hung Chang might not consider himself so bound by these indefinite promises as to overcome any special difficulties in order to accommodate us.

On a visit to the Tsung-li Yamên on the 16th, I asked whether the "arrangement," which was to be made for the American cable, contemplated the payment of money to the Northern Telegraph Company. The ministers (their excellencies Mao, Wang, Ch'ung Li, and Hsia being present) very emphatically assured me that it did not. They reiterated the assurance that the viceroy would complete the arrangement whenever the American company should be ready.

I told them that the plan was a less generous one than I had expected from this governmnent, but that without pursuing the discussion of the subject further at present, I should report to my government.

In this interview, as in previous interviews, the ministers sought to convey the impression that the whole of this telegraph business is in the hands of the viceroy, Li Hung Chang. No doubt this is substantially true, and although the present adjustment (if it can be so called) of the question is not what we could wish, it is probable that when an American company is ready to lay a cable the viceroy will enable the company to land and work the wire without too onerous conditions.

Though the results of my labors on this subject are far from satisfactory, I trust it will prove that my efforts have not been altogether in vain, and that my course will meet the approval of the Department.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 201.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

PEKING, August 7, 1881.

Referring to the proposed telegraph arrangement between the northern superintendent of trade and the Great Northern Telegraph Company, your excellency has had several consultations with us on the subject, and lately you sent us a communication setting forth three points wherein the arrangement was of doubtful expediency for China herself. We sent a copy of your dispatch for Li Chung T'ang's consideration and have received a reply from him in which he says with regard to the three points (of doubtful expediency):

"'1st. * * * In case of war between some western nation and Denmark or China the northern company's lines might be destroyed, and China would lose telegraphic connection with the world.' * * * 'In case of war with any foreign power, the ports of China would be blockaded, and if the cable is cut at sea it will be no great damage to China.'

"'2d. China cuts herself off from constructing land lines to Foochow, Canton, and other points in the south.' * * * 'There is no such language in the second article of the general rules; I fear it must be an error of translation.'

"3d. The agreements made between the Great Northern Telegraph Company and France and Russia, and the general rules to which sanction has been given in this case are in the main very much alike in this case. Moreover the said company have only begged that their request be granted, but no agreement has been made which can be likened" (to a contract), &c.

The viceroy having thus clearly stated his views on the foregoing three points, it would seem that no disadvantage is likely to result to China.

The request made by the Great Northern Telegraph Company has special reference to their cable already landed in China. If your country (i. e. any American company) proposes to lay a cable across the Pacific Ocean to China, it will of course not come under these rules. Your dispatch also says the Danish company has never proposed to lay a line between America and China. This is true. A line from America to China would be a different route. The northern and southern cables of the Great Northern Telegraph Company are lines from China to Europe and are different from an American line. If hereafter an American company lays a cable from San Francisco via the the Sandwich Islands to Japan it can, in no way, concern the Great Northern Telegraph Company; but when a cable from Japan to China is contemplated it will be well to communicate in advance with this office that we may write to the viceroy Li who will order the Great Northern Telegraph Company to consult thereon and make a compromise. It never was intended, as your dispatch intimates, to make a compromise, by treating the Danish company generously to the exclusion of an American company.

Peking, August 7, 1881.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 201.]

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

AUGUST 10, 1881.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your imperial highness's communication of the 7th instant, concerning the telgraph question. If I venture to trouble you again on the subject, I beg you will believe that it is only because of the great importance to the United States of a proper settlement of the question.

Permit me then, to make a few further inquiries, as briefly as possible.

1st. Since in the viceroy's reply to me, embodied in your communication, it is stated that my copy of the second article of the agreement is incorrect, may I ask if you can properly furnish me with a correct copy of the agreement?

2. May I ask whether the agreement has yet received imperial sanction, and so is definitely settled.

3. Am I to understand that an American company, notwithstanding the arrangement of the Chinese Government with the Northern Telegraph Company, is at liberty to lay a line when it chooses, directly from America, or from the Sandwich Islands to China. I understood the ministers of the Tsung-li Yamên, to say so in my last interview with them.

4. I do not understand clearly, what is meant by your statement: "When a cable from Japan to China is contemplated, it will be well to communicate in advance with this office, that we may write to the viceroy Li, who will order the Great Northern Telegraph Company, to consult thereon and make a compromise."

Am I to understand this as an assurance that some arrangement will certainly be made, by which the American company can continue its line from Japan to China? If so, may I ask what is the nature of the arrangement? And if unhappily the viceroy Li should die, is his successor held to the same promise, provided this is a promise.

With sentiments of the most distinguished consideration,

I am, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 3, in No. 201.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Angell.

AUGUST 14, 1881.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter concerning the telegraph question, in which you ask a few farther questions on certain points wherein this business is of the greatest importance to your government.

In answer to your first inquiry, viz, "Since the viceroy replies that my copy of the second article of the agreement is incorrect, may I ask you to furnish me with a copy of the agreement?" We send herewith for your inspection a copy of the second article of the company's petition.

2d. These general rules have been sanctioned by the viceroy Li in compliance with the petition of the Great Northern Telegraph Company.

Your third question is, "I gather from the purport of your communication that an American company, notwithstanding the arrangement of the Chinese Government with the Northern Telegraph Company, will be allowed to lay a cable when it chooses, directly from America, or from the Sandwich Islands to China. I beg you to say clearly if this is your meaning."

In answer we have to say, if hereafter an American company proposes to lay a cable from America to China, as this is a different route (from those of the Great Northern Telegraph Company), a compromise can be made.

Again you ask "* * * if this is an assurance, may I ask what is the nature of the arrangement?" As your country does not propose just now to lay a cable, we have nothing on which to propose a mode of arrangement. But, as we have distinctly stated in our former letter that there is no intention to cause disappointment to an American company, therefore when the time comes a satisfactory arrangement can certainly be reached after consultation.

Finally you ask, "If unhappily the viceroy Li should die, is his successor held to the same promise?" We cannot help saying this is being too particular. In all questions of intercourse between China and foreign countries, it is the propriety or otherwise of a question that is considered, without reference to whether the official who originally deliberated the question be in office or be succeeded by some one else.

We send this special reply with compliments.

In addition to your forcible presenting of the case and the evils not unlikely to result from such a course as the one proposed, you may call the attention of the Chinese authorities to the fact that the granting of monopolies of any kind is not conducive to public interests, and endeavor to dissuade them from giving their assent to any contracts like the one mentioned in your dispatch.

SIR: In my No. 143 I explained why I thought the Chinese Government had a right to enforce a rule, long suspended, requiring junks chartered by foreigners on the Yang-tse River to pay port dues at the native customs.

However, in interviews with the ministers of the foreign office, I suggested the inquiry whether the strict enforcement of the rule might not, by diverting freights to the steamers, work some injury to the local customs and to the boat owners, and asked them to consider whether they could not devise some plan by which the frauds complained of could be prevented and still an opportunity could be afforded for the chartering of junks by foreigners.

Thereupon they consulted the northern and southern superintendents of trade, who have made a report. This report is embodied in a communication which I have received from Prince Kung. It appears that the enforcement of the rule is not complained of by merchants and is increasing the revenue. It is therefore decided to keep it in force.

As further information confirms me in the belief that the chartering of junks by foreigners was largely a dishonest business, intended to defraud the native customs, I am not disposed to complain of the action of the Chinese Government.

PEKING, August 13, 1881.

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication:

In the month of May last I received a communication from your excellency concerning the enforcement of a rule requiring junks chartered by foreigners on the Yang-tse River to pay port dues at the native customs.

You said that this rule would work great hardship on the junk owners without increasing the revenue of the native customs. This office submitted the question to the consideration of the northern and southern superintendents of trade, directing them to report thereon. Their report has now been received in the following terms:

"By the regulations of the board of revenue, junks are required to pay dues at every customs station which they pass. Before China engaged in trade with foreigners, junk dues were levied in accordance with this rule. During these many years the Hankow customs modified the rule and levied junk dues once every four months; this was a temporary measure. Last year the Chinese customs were instructed to enforce the sixth article of the rules for trade on the Yang-tse River. Since the enforcement of the rule there have been no complaints on the part of the merchants, and a decided benefit is resulting to the revenue without working any injury to the junk trade. It is our duty to report a faithful representation of the facts."

This office finds that the above measure is in accordance with one of the rules for trade on the Yang-tse River, and as the report says the revenue will be benefited without injury to trade, it is naturally our duty to instruct the customs stations to enforce the regulation.

As in duty bound, we send this reply to your excellency's dispatch.

SIR: Some months ago my attention was called to the fact that there was at times a serious obstruction to judicial proceedings in our consular courts in China from a lack of suitable regulations for the service of summons on absent defendants. In some cases defendants have concealed themselves in remote towns in the empire. In many cases they had left the country.

After due consideration of the subject, I decided to issue a decree to remedy the defect in our regulations. Knowing how easy it is to do injustice to absent defendants by inadequate provisions for summoning them, I aimed to take every precaution to secure to them their rights. I trust it will be found that my effort was successful.

The decree has been assented to by all our consular officers, and some of them have written in emphatic terms of the benefits it will secure.

I. In civil proceedings between American citizens in the consular courts in China, the service of summons upon the defendant, if he is found within the Empire of China, shall be personal—that is, the copy of the complaint and summons, duly certified by a marshal of any consular court in China, shall be delivered into the hands of the person to be served. The officer so serving the summons shall certify the same to the consul before whom the suit is brought.

II. When the defendant has removed from or is absent from the empire, or conceals himself therein to avoid the service of summons, and the fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the consul, and it also appears by such affidavit or by the verified complaint on file that a good cause of action exists against the defendant, or that he is a necessary party to the action, such consul may make an order that the service be made by publication of the summons. Such order shall direct the publication to be made in a newspaper of general circulation (to be named) for such length of time as may be reasonable, in not less than six issues of such paper, if a daily, and in not less than four issues, if a weekly. Such publication shall be made in a newspaper published nearest to the consulate where the suit or proceeding is pending at least five months before the time fixed for the trial by the consul.

In case of publication when the residence of a non-resident or absent defendant is unknown, the consul shall direct a copy of the complaint and summons, duly certified and addressed to the person to be served at his supposed place of residence, to be deposited in the post-office by the marshal of said court.

Mr. Hitt to Mr. Angell.

No. 125.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 10, 1881.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 182 of July 16 last, reporting your further steps in the matter of the Danish Telegraph Company's monopoly scheme has been received.

Your letter to Prince Kung and your efforts to prevent the grant of the telegraph monopoly of the Chinese coast are approved. Such a monopoly would be prejudicial to our interests and contrary to our idea of the true interests of China.

I am, sir,

ROBERT R. HITT,
Acting Secretary,

No. 179.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 212.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 14, 1881. (Received November 4.)

SIR: Since I wrote my No. 151, April, 30, on transit passes outwards, the diplomatic body have considered the subject in several conferences, and Mr. von Brandt, the German minister, has most industriously carried on the negotiations with the Tsung-li Yamên. We seemed to be on the very verge of a tolerably satisfactory agreement with the foreign office, when suddenly the Chinese ministers came forward with so important and unacceptable modifications that the diplomatic body at their meeting of July 11 were agreed that it was useless to prolong negotiations on such a basis. As some of the ministers have been absent from the capital during the summer, negotiations have been suspended for some weeks. It seems proper, therefore, that I should report what has been attempted since April. I cannot do this better than by inclosing a memorandum which Mr. von Brandt submitted

July 6, with a draft of provisional rules on transit passes outwards. The foreign representatives were prepared to adopt this with but slight modifications or additions, and it was supposed the Tsung-li Yamên would agree to them. The memorandum gives a brief review of the negotiations from the beginning. I inclose also the provisional rules. I do not deem it necessary to give a detailed account of the discussions in the conferences and of the various steps by which the rules were brought into their form as here given.

Mr. von Brandt's communication (confidential) of July 10 gives so fully the particulars of his interview with the foreign office that I need not dwell upon it. You will observe that the Tsung-li Yamên insisted on two concessions which we could not think of making. 1st. Foreign goods admitted free of duty shipped coastwise should pay coast-trade duty. 2d. Goods manufactured from native produce bought at the port should be subjected to the same restrictions as goods manufactured from produce brought down under transit pass. We believe that there is no ground in the treaties on which either of these claims can rest, and as the Tsung-li Yamên insisted on both of them, the negotiations were necessarily brought to a standstill.

The diplomatic body have recently had further conference on the subject and have decided to renew the effort to gain the assent of the Yamên to the provisional rules.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 212.]

Mr. von Brandt's memorandum.

PEKING, July 6, 1881.

Mr. von Brandt has the honor to lay before his colleagues the final result of his negotiations with the Tsung-li Yamên on the subject of the treatment of Chinese produce in the hands of foreigners.

Before proceeding to review the scheme now before his colleagues, Mr. von Brandt begs to draw their attention to the purposes for which the negotiations were begun and to the different stages through which they have passed.

The aim of the foreign representatives in bringing this question to the notice of the Yamên was to do away as much as possible with the complaints raised on the one hand by foreign merchants on account of the failure of the Chinese authorities honestly and completely to carry out the treaty provisions; and, on the other, by the Chinese Government against abuses and frauds, which it pretended to be perpetrated by foreigners under cover of the treaty provisions. This last complaint has been one of long standing on the part of the Chinese Government. Several times in 1872 (on March 23, and again on December 25), and in 1877 (on January 29) proposals to remedy the existing abuses had been laid before the foreign representatives by the Yamên, without, however, bringing about the desired end. Similar attempts had been made with no better success by some of the local Chinese authorities, until at last rules for the issue and use of transit passes outwards were arbitrarily introduced and enforced by the Chinese local authorities at some of the open ports, viz., at Chin-Kian, Pakhoi, and Hoihow, while a similar attempt at Shanghai proved abortive.

Though no objections could be raised against some of the provisions contained in these rules, others were contrary to existing treaty stipulations and oppressive, while the mode of their introduction, without the consent of the treaty powers having been first obtained, gave rise to grave apprehensions.

To do away with these local regulations, and to replace them by a general and uniform rule for all the open ports, was, therefore, the first object to be kept in view, while it seemed not less desirable and necessary to facilitate by the adoption of such uniform rules the bona fide introduction of the transit-pass system into those southern provinces, where, to the knowledge of all, it had not yet found any practical application.

It seemed further necessary to make use of the present opportunity to remove some complaints, repeatedly pressed upon the attention of the foreign representatives by the illegal action of Chinese local authorities, viz:

1. The levy of export duty on (by treaty, duty free) native produce when carried coastwise;

2. The imposition of the payment of inland taxes on native produce bought at the port, when exported; and

3. The imposition of the payment of inland taxes on goods manufactured at the port from native produce bought there, when exported.

It was from these points of view and with these intentions that the first draft of the proposals to be laid before the Yamên by Mr. von Brandt in the name of his colleagues was discussed and adopted by the foreign representatives then resident at Peking.

The draft was handed to the Chinese ministers on May 18, 1880, when they declared that as far as they could see there was nothing in the proposals laid before them to which the Tsung-li Yamên could not assent, but that they would have to take the opinion of the two superintendents of trade on the subject.

It was only on September 27 that the ministers came forward with counter-proposals, the chief features of which were that in Rule I the provision for a joint investigation in cases of fine and confiscation (article 9) was omitted, while Rule II was completely eliminated under pretext that the treaties made no mention of duty free native produce.

In Rule III, with regard to the proposal that goods manufactured at the port from native produce bought there should, on exportation, not be called upon to pay any other duty or tax than the export duty, the Yamên claimed that the native produce, before being submitted to any manufacturing process, ought to undergo inspection by the customs authorities.

Some of the minor changes introduced by the Yamên in their counter-proposals were accepted by the foreign representatives in a conference held among themselves on October 25, while the changes above mentioned in Rules I, II, and III were rejected, and the former tenor either maintained or only altered in so far as to render it more precise.

This new set of proposals was laid before the Yamên on October 29.

On November 19 the ministers returned a verbal answer that they were willing to agree to Rule I, article 9, as well as to the remainder of the rule, but that in view of the strong objections raised by the provincial authorities they could accept neither Rule II nor Rule III. They proposed, therefore, to omit these two sections.

The answer returned to this, first verbally on the same day, and in writing on November 26, was that the aim of the measures proposed being to do away as much as possible with all causes of complaint and irritation, the foreign representatives had to insist upon the acceptance by the Yamên of Rules II and III, without which any arrangement would be incomplete and unacceptable to them.

In their answer of December 5 the ministers of the Yamên, while pointing out the discrepancies existing in the list of duty-free goods as contained in the treaties, objected to the introduction of Rule II into the arrangement on the ground that, as it was intended only to reassert a right granted already by the former treaties, its repetition seemed superfluous. With regard to Rule III the ministers repeated their proposals of an inspection of the native goods bought at the port and intended for manufacturing purposes.

In a note dated January 9, 1881, Mr. von Brandt replied to this, with the concurrence of his colleagues, that the foreign representatives were willing to recognize that the list of duty-free goods inserted in the treaties was not as clear and distinct as might be desired; they, therefore, proposed to the Yamên to accept in lieu of Trade Rule 2 another version of it which would do away with the discrepancies complained of. With regard to Rules II and III, the foreign representatives repeated their former arguments.

The reply of the ministers, dated February 9, 1881, raised some further questions with regard to the list of duty-free goods, while maintaining their former position on the other subjects.

Owing to the absence of the first interpreter of the German legation, it was only on June 2 that Mr. von Brandt had an interview with the Tsung-li Yamên. On this occasion he insisted on the necessity of settling all the pending questions at the same time, and declared that though he was not authorized to speak in the name of his colleagues, he, for himself personally, could not but regard the acceptance by the Yamên of some stipulations similar to those contained in Rules II and III as the conditio sine qua non of the conclusion of any arrangement whatever. In the ensuing discussion the ministers of the Yamên abandoned most of their objections formerly raised against Rules II and III, and they promised to give their best attention to the proposals before them.

On June 9 they presented two counter-proposals for Rules II and III, which, while not yet being quite satisfactory in all their details, showed a decided progress compared with the former attitude assumed by the ministers.

At a conference on June 15 the discussion resulted in a new proposal by the Yamên, which, coupled with some verbal declarations by the ministers and the assurance of their readiness to repeat them in writing, seemed to do away with the principal difficulty encountered until then in the course of the negotiations.

At another conference on June 25 new difficulties arose, however, with regard to the treatment of duty-free native produce shipped coast-wise, notwithstanding some further concessions on this point on the part of the foreign negotiator. His excellency Wang, who throughout all the conferences had been the spokesman of his colleagues, stated that the Yamên did neither know nor understand the reason which had prompted his former colleague, Shen, to accept the proposal of a new list of duty-free goods; that the Yamên would prefer by far to leave matters as they were, but that in any case, if the revised list was to be maintained, some changes ought to be introduced with regard to the items, "household and ship stores," by either restricting their exoneration from duty to foreign stores only, or by adding some characters in the Chinese text which would be indicative of small quantities of such stores only being admissible free of duty. Mr. von Brandt, being unable to agree to these proposals, the conference came to an end without an understanding on these points being arrived at.

A further conference on July 1, between Mr. Arendt (the German interpretor) and the Yamên, brought no better results. On the contrary, the opposition of the ministers to Rule II took a still further form, and they asked for the insertion of a clause stating that the goods mentioned as duty free were so only when imported for personal use.

They conceded, however, on this day, another important point, proposed to them for the first time on June 25, viz, that all claims now pending under one of the heads contained in the rules under consideration should be settled in accordance with the principles laid down in them.

On July 3 their excellencies Wang Mao, Ching Lien, Ch'ung Li, and Hsia continuing to offer the same resistance as formerly to the application of the treaty provisions on duty-free goods, as understood by the foreign representatives, Mr. von Brandt declared to them that the acceptance of the principle put forward in Rule II was a conditio sine qua non for the continuation of the negotiations, and that unless the ministers were ready to agree to it, he would prefer to break off all further pourparlers on the question now before them. This brought matters to a climax, but it was not without still much further discussion that the ministers agreed to Rule II as it now stands.

With regard to the annexed draft, the result of long and tedious negotiations, Mr. von Brandt has the honor to lay the following remarks before his colleagues:

Rule I, for the issue and surrender of transit passes outwards, may be considered as nearly entirely satisfactory. While doing away with the just complaints of the Yamên, by reasonably limiting the time within which use has to be made of the transit passes and certificates, or within which native produce brought to a port under transit certificate has to be exported, the uniform treatment of this question by the local authorities, which is to be one of the results of the arrangement, will help in bringing about the practical application of the transit-pass system in all the provinces of the empire. At the same time the joint investigation in all cases of confiscation and fine, instituted by Article 9 of this rule, will very materially contribute to render the settlement of claims more easy and rapid, and thereby diminish the chances of foreigners having to suffer from the illegal action of the local authorities.

The only not quite satisfactory point in this part of the arrangement seems to be in Article 5, paragraph 2, where the Yamên will only consent to grant one month's extension of time in case the original six months should prove insufficient for the purposes of exportation. It may, however, be safely assumed that seven months in all will meet the requirements of every case that will present itself. The reason given by the Yamên for their desire to limit thus the powers of the customs authorities is, that the principal rule itself would be nullified if the customs were at liberty to extend ad libitum the time originally named for exportation.

Rule II, for the treatment of duty-free native produce, and foreign imports, is in its present form very nearly a reproduction of trade Rule II, of the treaties with an addition referring to the payment of coast-trade duty, by duty-free native produce. The list of duty-free goods has been revised and rectified, where its provisions were in contradiction with the tariffs, and slightly modified in so far as a number of less important articles were, at the desire of the Chinese ministers, made duty free only when of foreign origin.

The clause giving the customs power to act according to their judgment in the case of household-stores and ship-stores when being imported in excessive quantities, does little more than reaffirm the right which they have undoubtedly always possessed to protect the revenue against fraud. The clause may therefore be regarded as superfluous; but as the ministers seem to attach great value to it, it may perhaps be inserted without any apprehension of complications arising through it. From every other point of view, Rule II, as it reads now, is by far preferable to the former trade rule 2, as it finally does away with the objections constantly raised by the Chinese Government, that only foreign articles ought to be considered duty free, and even those only when imported for personal use.

Rule III, for the exportation of goods bought or manufactured in the port, is on the whole very satisfactory. The changes which were introduced into it in the course of the negotiations can hardly be said to have taken away from its thoroughness; on the contrary, the present text appears to be even more to the point than the former one, as instead of only asserting in general terms certain principles it condemns expressly the use of those illegal exactions by the Chinese local officials, which gave rise to so many complaints. The obligation imposed on the foreign merchant to furnish the customs with a statement that the goods to be exported by him were bought at the port, seems little dangerous, hedged in, as it is by the positive assurances that nothing more shall be asked, while the previous inspection of native produce intended to undergo some manufacturing process ought hardly to give rise to suspicion. This part of the agreement has besides the advantage of giving a legal status to the manufacturing of goods at the port out of native produce brought there under transit pass, which, until now, could be done only with the tacit acquiescence of the customs.

All the rules are to be provisional, and in force only for a few years, after the expiration of which they may continue so, if they give satisfaction, until formally denounced by one of the contracting parties. With regard to the date of their introduction, it seems best to put them in force provisionally, and, pending the approval of the governments of the treaty powers, without any further delay. Not only would the existing abuses thereby be remedied immediately, and a cause of much irritation and complaint be removed, but the time which must necessarily elapse between the date of the provisional putting in force of these measures, and that of the arrival of the approval of the home governments will give an opportunity to judge of the good faith of the Chinese officials and the working of the new rules. It might perhaps even be well to recommend to the home governments to grant their approval of the measures only on the condition of their having worked satisfactorily in the mean time.

DRAFT OF PROVISIONAL RULES.

I.

FOR THE ISSUE AND SURRENDER OF TRANSIT PASSES (OUTWARDS).

ARTICLE 1. These rules coming into force on the —— day, —— moon, —— year of Kwang Hsü all outward transit passes issued before this date shall, after the expiration of one year, if the merchant has not (within that time) reported for examination to the customs authorities by whom the passes were issued the native produce stated in the pass as to be bought and the corresponding transit certificate, be forthwith canceled by the superintendent of customs, and the corresponding transit certificates recalled, and all goods which the holders of such canceled passes may attempt to bring down under them will be confiscated.

All outward transit passes issued subsequently to the —— day, —— moon, ——year of Kwang Hsü, and not used within one year from date of issue, will be canceled at the expiration of such year.

ART. 2. Henceforward all outward transit passes* which may not have been availed of for the purchase of produce within one year from the date of issue will be forthwith canceled by the superintendent of customs and the corresponding transit certificates recalled, and all goods which the holders of such canceled passes may attempt to bring down under them will be confiscated.

In any case of loss of a transit pass by theft or otherwise, the merchant to whom it was issued must report the loss at once to the customs of the port, that the pass may be canceled and the corresponding transit certificate recalled. For any unlawful use of such canceled transit pass after the loss has been reported the original holder shall not be held responsible.

No further passes will be issued to a merchant whose passes have had to be canceled, their time having expired, or who, in opposition to this rule, does not surrender his passes.

ART. 3. Produce purchased under transit pass must arrive at the barrier nearest the port within six months (one year at Tientsin) from the date of the exchange of the transit pass for a transit certificate. In default of this the goods will be liable to confiscation.

* Styled in treaties "Memoranda."

Should, however, produce be detained en route, either by the action of barrier or other officials, by force majeure, or by unforeseen accidents, such as floods, rebels, or the like, and be unable, in consequence, to arrive within the time allowed, the circumstances of such detention must be reported at once to the authorities on the spot, and to the superintendent of customs at the port, who will grant such an extension of time as the circumstances of the case may require. The goods, meanwhile, will not be liable to confiscation, unless they arrive at the port within the extended time allowed.

ART. 4. On the arrival of the produce at the barrier nearest the port, or, where there is no further barrier, on the shortest and most direct line between the one at which the transit certificate was issued and the port at the custom-house, an application giving the full particulars of the packages, and their contents, must be sent in to the commissioner of customs, who will issue a permit to allow the goods declared to pass the last barrier. The produce, on arriving at the port, must be brought direct to the customs jetty for examination and payment of transit dues, which being done, the goods may be stored in the merchant's go-down. Any merchant failing to comply with this rule the goods will be liable to confiscation.

In case of alleged damage and deterioration of the goods en route the customs, on the application of the merchant, will inspect the goods, and if the damage, &c., be proved, grant a proportionate diminution of the transit dues.

ART. 5. Produce brought from the interior under transit pass must be exported to a foreign port or to another treaty port for reshipment to a foreign port within six months from the date of its arrival at the port. If the produce be not exported within the said period, the merchant shall pay to the customs a sum equal to two and a half times the export duty and be released from the obligation to export.

The customs authorities shall be at liberty to grant an extension of the time for reshipment of one month in every case where it is proved to their satisfaction that shipment within the prescribed time will be impossible.

When the produce is shipped to another treaty port for subsequent reshipment to a foreign country the merchant must produce a certificate from the customs of the other port to the effect that the goods have been shipped to a foreign country within twelve months of their arrival in that port; or, in default in addition to forfeiting the half duty deposited, he should pay to the customs a sum equal to an additional export duty (so that the whole payment made will be equal to two and a half times the export duty) and be released from the obligation to export.

ART. 6. A merchant desirous to repack prior to shipment the native produce which he has brought down under transit pass, must first make application to the customs, who having verified the goods will issue a "permit to repack," and will depute an officer to repair to the go down and superintend the repacking.

Any unauthorized repacking of goods or willful alteration of their condition by the substitution or addition of other goods will render them liable to confiscation.

ART. 7. In cases of alleged damage and deterioration in intrinsic value, sustained by goods while at the port, the customs, on the application of the merchant, will depute an officer to examine the goods and appraise the actual amount of damage sustained. A deduction in the amount of export duty payable will be made in proportion to the ascertained damage, and should the merchant desire to be released from his obligation to export such damaged goods, his obligation will be canceled on his paying to the customs a sum equal to two and a half times the diminished export duty.

ART. 8. Should a merchant be about to give up his business and leave the port he shall return to his consul for immediate cancellation all transit passes which have been taken out by him and not yet used. Should there be at the time of his closing business any goods which have been bought in the interior under transit pass or passes taken out by him, but which have not yet arrived at the port, or which are awaiting shipment to a foreign country, at this or another treaty port, the persons to whom such goods or the disposition thereof may be transferred will be held responsible for the observance of these rules.

When transferring such goods the merchant shall report the nationality and the name of the merchant to whom the goods are transferred, to the consul, by whom they will be communicated to the superintendent of customs to be placed on record, in order that the merchant may not throw off any responsibility afterwards.

ART. 9. In all cases in which under these rules goods are liable to confiscation and the whole or some part of them is not forthcoming, the person in default is liable for the goods not produced.

ART. 10. In all cases of fine or confiscation arising out of these rules the same procedure will be followed, which is laid down in the rules for joint investigation in cases of confiscation and fine by the customs authorities of the seventh year of Tung Chih (1868).

If a fine awarded remains unpaid no new transit passes will be issued to the merchant who is in default, and all passes already taken out by him may be canceled by the superintendent, and the corresponding transit certificates recalled.

Rule II.

FOR THE TREATMENT OF DUTY-FREE FOREIGN IMPORTS AND NATIVE PRODUCE.

The following goods shall be duty free:

Of Foreign Manufacture or Origin.	Of Foreign or Native Manufacture or Origin.
Coins.	Gold and silver in bullion.
Confectionery.	Biscuits.
Clothing.	Preserved meats and vegetables.
Candles.	Cheese.
Tobacco.	Soap.
Cigars.	Charcoal.
Butter.	Fire wood.
Flour.	Household stores.
Indian meal.	Ship stores.
Sago.	Personal baggage.
Plated ware.	Cutlery.
Jewelry.
Perfumery.
Wine, beer, and spirits.
Stationery.
Carpeting.
Druggeting.
Glass and crystal ware.
Medicines, unless specially mentioned in the tariff.

The above enumerated articles are free from duty. With regard, however, to the two items, "household stores" and "ship stores," if their quantity as to weight or number of packages should be excessive, the customs authorities shall, as heretofore, be at liberty to act after their best judgment according to the merits of each case.

Whenever any native produce declared to be duty free is shipped, it is to be shipped accordingly, exempt from tariff export duty; when relanded it is exempt from tariff import duty, but it has to pay a coast-trade duty, the amount of which is declared to be 2½ per cent. ad valorem.

Duty-free goods of foreign manufacture or origin are exempt from import and coast-trade duty, but if they are transported into the interior, they shall, with the exception of personal baggage, gold and silver bullion, and foreign coins, pay a transit duty at the rate of 2½ per cent. ad valorem.

A freight or part freight of duty-free commodities (personal baggage, gold and silver bullion, foreign coins excepted), will render the vessel carrying them, though no other cargo be on board, liable to tonnage dues.

Rule III.

FOR THE EXPORTATION OF GOODS BOUGHT OR MANUFACTURED IN THE PORT.

Art. I. Native merchandise bought at a port is to pay tariff export duty when shipped, but is not called upon to pay any other duty or tax whatsoever. When native produce is to be exported, with the exception, however, of native produce brought down from the interior of the country under transit pass, that is to say, as regards such native produce as has been purchased at the port, merely a declaration shall be required to the effect that it has really not been brought down under transit pass from the interior. The production of duty and lekin certificates shall not be demanded.

Art. 2. Whenever native produce, no matter whether arrived under transit pass or purchased at the port, is to be manufactured within the port, notice thereof shall previously be given to the custom-house, whereupon the customs authorities will at once dispatch an officer to inspect the produce in question, before the commencement of the manufacturing process. Fees for such proceeding shall not be demanded on the part of the custom-house. The goods so manufactured on being shipped shall have to pay only the tariff export duty applicable to them in their present state, but be exempt from all other taxes (duties and lekin) whatsoever. But if such goods are exported to another treaty port, they shall be dealt with according to regulations in force with regard to native produce.

Clause to be inserted in Rule III, Article 2.

With regard to goods manufactured out of produce brought down under transit pass to the port, an exception shall be made to the terms of shipment, as mentioned in Rule I, Article 5. The merchant who, at the expiration of the period of six months, there indicated, has not yet shipped his goods, and is unwilling to pay the additional duty which would liberate him from the obligation of exporting them, will, however, have to store them in a go down at his own expense, under the supervision of the customs authorities, whence they will not be allowed to be taken out except for the purpose of exportation, it being forbidden, under penalty of confiscation, to sell them in the port where they have been manufactured. He shall, however, be at liberty to transfer them to another merchant for purposes of exportation, due notice of such transaction being given to the customs through the consular authority of the seller.

All the rules under heads I, II, and III to be provisional and to remain in force for a period of four years; after the expiration of this period they shall also continue in force, unless formally denounced by one of the contracting parties, when they shall cease to be in force six months after the date on which notice was given.

All claims now pending under any one of the heads contained in these rules shall be settled in accordance with the principles laid down in them.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 212.]

Mr. von Brandt to Mr. Angell.

Confidential.] PEKING, July 10, 1881.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I regret to have to inform you of the unfavorable turn which my negotiations with the Chinese ministers on the subject of transit passes outwards, &c., have taken at the conference which I had at the Yamên to-day with their excellencies Wang, Ching Lien, Mao, Lin Shu, and Hsia.

The ministers began by stating that further reflection had shown them the necessity of making some changes and additions in the rules now under discussion. Foreign duty-free goods shipped coastwise ought to pay coast-trade duty, and goods manufactured by foreigners from native produce bought at the port or brought down under transit pass ought to be exported within the term of six, resp. seven months mentioned in Rule I, Art. 5. To my objection to the first proposal, that all foreign imports could freely and without payment of coast-trade duty be transported from one open port to another, the ministers replied that trade rule 2 contained nothing on the subject, and that consequently foreign duty-free goods were subject to coast-trade duty exactly in the same manner as duty-free native produce and that, if imports having paid import duty were free from coast-trade duty, they were so on account of their having paid some other duty already.

Not thinking it worth my while seriously to discuss such a proposal I replied that if such were the views of the ministers I was quite willing to agree to a rule by which foreign or native goods having paid import or export duty were freed from coast-trade duty, while duty-free goods of foreign or Chinese origin would have to pay the coast-trade duty equal to 2½ per cent.

This for the moment effectually silenced the ministers on this point.

With regard to the second proposal, referring to the time within which goods manufactured at the port from native produce were to be exported, I informed the ministers that my colleagues and I had also felt the necessity of providing some rule on this subject, and that I was authorized by my colleagues to lay before them the inclosed proposal, which we hoped would meet their views, as, while giving sufficient facility for the exportation of manufactures made at the port, it protected effectually the customs against any attempt at fraud; regulations on this subject restrictive as to the time of exportation could, however, of course, be made only for such goods as had been manufactured at the ports from native produce brought there under transit pass, goods manufactured from produce bought at the port being subject to no such restriction.

This proposal gave rise to a good deal of discussion, the ministers objecting to the exemption from the restrictions of goods manufactured at the ports from produce brought there, and bringing forward several counter proposals, in which both classes of goods were subject to the same restrictions, consisting mostly in a limitation of the time within which they ought to be exported. In the course of this rather desultory conversation I was struck by a casual remark from the minister Hsia to the effect that foreigners could not be allowed to compete with Chinese in the trade in native produce. The remark not having been addressed directly to me, I did not feel called upon to take it up then and there, but it seemed to me to contain the keynote of the Yamên's new objections.

Finally, after more than two hours' discussion, in which no progress had been made, the ministers draughted the inclosed proposal, to which I replied that, while I was willing, though seeing very grave objections against any limitation of the time for exportation, to lay the part of the proposal referring to such a measure before my colleagues, I could not do so with any hope of success with the port applying the same restrictions to goods manufactured from produce bought at the port as to those made from produce brought there under transit pass. The Chinese Government had the right to exercise the strictest supervision over native produce brought from the interior under transit pass, such produce having been exempted from the payment of inland taxes, under the express condition that it was intended for export, this obligation only to be canceled in case of the payment of two and a half times the export duty, which payment was to compensate the Chinese authorities for the loss of the inland taxes. With regard, however, to goods bought at the port, the foreigner was at liberty to deal with them as he liked without any restriction as to time or use; he might export them, sell them to foreigners or natives, manufacture them, forward them for sale to the interior, or destroy them without any hinderance or supervision from the Chinese authorities, provided he paid, on exportation, the tariff export duty due on them in the state in which they were at the time of exportation, or, when transported inland, all native charges and duties.

To this the ministers replied that, by treaty, foreigners had the right to buy produce either in the interior or at the port for exportation only to some foreign country or some other treaty port, and that they were not allowed to put it to any other use nor sell it at the port unless they paid two and a half times the export duty to the government, to make good the loss of the export duty to which the Chinese Government was entitled on all produce bought by a foreigner, either at the port or brought there under transit pass; that Chinese having to pay taxes and duties on all commercial transactions amongst themselves within the ports, foreigners could not be allowed to compete with Chinese under more favorable terms; they would therefore have to pay the same taxes as Chinese if they wished to sell Chinese produce bought by them at the port.

The government, however, were willing to make a concession to foreigners by not insisting upon their treaty right as far as native produce in its natural state was concerned, but they must insist upon goods manufactured out of native produce bought at the port, being not disposed of at the port without having paid two and a half times the export duty.

Another hour having passed in useless attempts to prove to the ministers that the views put forward by them were not only contrary to treaty, but also to all sound principles of commerce, I finally declared that unless the ministers were prepared to accept the treatment of native produce, in its original state or manufactured, when bought at the port, the rules as laid down by me in the course of the conversation, I could but consider any further discussion as useless. The ministers agreed to this, adding that the imposition of the same restrictions on goods manufactured from produce bought at the port, as from produce brought there under transit pass was the last word of the Yamên.

Though I do not believe this to be the case, I cannot but consider any further discussion with the Yamên of the whole question as worse than useless, the general impression I have received from the two last conferences being that while the Yamên will not fail to stretch to the utmost every concession made to it by the foreign representatives, there seems to be very little chance indeed of seeing the foreign complaints done away with by a strict execution of the new rules agreed upon in their favor. The whole spirit in which the whole discussion during the two last conferences has been conducted by the Yamên has been one eminently unfair, distorting the stipulations of the existing treaties so as to make them seem to uphold the most unjustifiable pretensions, and making use of every concession obtained from the foreign representatives in the course of these negotiations to base some new claim upon it. As an instance of this I may state that the first part of Rule III—2. "Whenever native produce, no matter whether arrived under transit pass or purchased at the port, is to be manufactured within the port, notice thereof shall previously be given to the custom-house"—was brought forward by the ministers as a proof that the foreign representatives themselves had recognized that the two kinds of goods ought to be treated alike. It is these proceedings which render any concessions to the Chinese so dangerous. For example, were the foreign representatives to agree to the treatment of goods bought at the port and manufactured there, as proposed by the Yamên, this concession would be claimed in after days, when the arrangement now before us was denounced, as implying the recognition on their part of the claim put forward by the Chinese that foreigners could buy native produce only for purposes of exportation.

I am unwilling to take the responsibility of recommending to my colleagues the acceptance, as a whole or in part, of the arrangement negotiated under their instructions and approval with the Tsung-li Yamên. Nothing, therefore, remains to me but to return to them the powers which they had confided to me, and to express to them my most sincere thanks for the forbearance which they have shown in the course of these very lengthy negotiations, and the support I have invariably received from them.

I avail myself, &c.,

[Annex to Inclosure No. 3.]

Yamén's proposal of July 10, 1881.

Native produce brought down under transit pass to the port, as well as native produce which has been subjected to a manufacturing process, shall, with regard to the term of shipment, be dealt with in the manner set forth in the above stipulations; as, however, native produce bought at the port, when it is subjected to a manufacturing process, cannot be put on the same level with native produce which, without having been subjected to such a process, is directly exported, so that cases may arise in which the term of six months, fixed in Article 5, might not be sufficient, the customs toatai shall, if the circumstances justify it, have the right to extend the term of shipment in such a way, however, that the whole term conceded shall not exceed a period of ——— months. As regards native produce bought at the port and goods manufactured there out of native produce, if at the expiration of the six-monthly term they have not yet been exported, notice thereof shall be given to the customs, who will thereupon inspect them and put them under official lock, from where they shall not be taken out except for the purpose of exportation. A sale of them at the port is not permitted, under the penalty of confiscation. If any one of the above categories of goods are reimported into another treaty port, they shall be dealt with in accordance with the regulations in force for native produce.

No. 179.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 214.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 17, 1881. (Received November 4.)

SIR: On the 27th of August I received from Mr. Consul Shepard, of Hankow, a dispatch calling my attention to a case of interference at Nan-Ch'ang-fu, the capital of the province of Kiangsi, with the Christian work of a native helper sent to that city by the Rev. Mr. Hart, an American missionary at Kiu Kiang. The dispatch covered correspondence between the consul and Mr. Hart. I do not deem it necessary to send you the correspondence, as the essential facts reported in it are embodied in my dispatch on the subject to Prince Kung, a copy of which is inclosed.

You will observe that the helper leased premises near a gate of the city. He was received kindly by the neighbors but was soon disturbed by a person, who is a sort of head man of a hundred families, and has a certain responsibility for them. This person after trying in vain to persuade him to leave, finally put the furniture of the helper into a boat and sent him with it down the river.

The district magistrate afterwards admitted to the foreign missionary, who went to Nan-Ch'ang-fu to inquire into the case, the right of the helper to hire the premises, but argued that the neighbors and the owners of the house were opposed to his remaining.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the whole proceeding was instigated by petty officials, and the class of gentry who originate all the opposition to missionary work. Nan-Ch'ang-fu has acquired an unenviable notoriety heretofore for its hostility to foreigners, even those who are not missionaries. One of the British secretaries, sent there some years ago to visit the governor on business, was very rudely treated.

As we have no consul resident in the province of Kiangsi, I thought it wise, rather than to instruct Mr. Consul Shepard to open correspondence with the governor, as I should have done if the trouble had occurred in his province, to confer myself directly with the Yamên.

On the 6th instant I sent Mr. Acting Interpreter Taylor to the foreign office, instructing him to express my regret that there seemed to be of late an increasing tendency to interfere with the peaceable prosecution of missionary work, to recite the facts in the case, to say that I could see no reason why under the treaties our missionaries might not send a native helper to Nan-Ch'ang-fu to hire premises and teach Christianity, that this seemed to be expressly provided for by the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Tientsin, and to inquire whether the authorities at Nan-Ch'ang-fu could not be notified that such interference as that complained of is improper and should hereafter be prevented.

The ministers talked of the matter in an excellent spirit; said that these little troubles about missionary work could not be altogether prevented, and asked that I would send in an informal letter on the subject. Accordingly on the next day I sent to Prince Kung the letter above referred to and herewith inclosed.

The prince has replied, saying that he will at once write to the authorities at Nan-Ch'ang-fu to learn what they have to say of the facts.

This is one of the cases in which, as I conceive, it is easy for the missionary to suppose that our treaty rights are broader than they really are. I think we may properly claim the right of the foreign missionaries to send a helper anywhere in the empire to teach Christianity, and that the helper may, if necessary for his work, hire premises. But I see no assurance in any treaty that the foreigner may rent or buy buildings in interior cities. The fact that they have so long and in so many places been permitted to do so, doubtless entitles us to remonstrate against any sudden change or perhaps against any change at all in the tolerant policy of the government. But, after all, it must be remembered that we cannot base on the treaties an argument for the right of purchasing or renting property in cities like Nan Ch'ang-fu.

I have written in this sense to Mr. Consul Shepard. I have also informed him of the action of the foreign office.

I have, &c.,

JAMES B. ANGELL.

Mr. Angell to Prince Kung.

PEKING, September 7, 1881.

SIR: Yesterday I sent Mr. Acting Interpreter Taylor to the Tsung-li Yamên to confer with the ministers concerning what seems to me an unwarrantable interference with the Christian work of a Chinese teacher employed at Nan Ch'ang-fu in Kiangsi by American missionaries. The ministers desire me to send in a communication.

By the instructions of the missionaries this teacher went to the provincial capital in June last, and rented premises just outside the Teh Sheng Gate and began his work. He was received with entire courtesy and kindness by the neighbors.

The owner of the house with willingness leased it to him, a deed of rental was executed in due form, and one term's rent was paid in advance. While he was thus peaceably at work some persons from the Pao Kia-chü, and afterwards the Pao Kia himself, called to tell him he must not stay. Finding they could not easily frighten him away, they tried to alarm the owner of the house and succeeded in this, who then asked the teacher to go. On the 6th of July, the Pao Kia-chü hired a boat and ordered his men to take the teacher's furniture from the house, and sent him away to Wu Cheng.

The American missionary, resident at Wu Ch'eng, went to Nan-Ch'ang-fu and saw the Chi-hsien. This magistrate admitted the right to hire the premises, but argued that the people were unwilling the teacher should stay, and finally produced a deed of sale of the premises leased, to show that the relatives of the man who leased the property wished to part with it. The missionary replied, and with justice, that the deed of sale could not affect the deed of rental for the term, which had been paid for, and that the neighbors were not unwilling that the teacher should remain until the Pao Kia and his men stirred them up to opposition. But as the Chi-hsien was unwilling to take any action, the missionary left and reported the fact to our consul at Hankow; we have no consul in Kiangsi.

It seems to me very clear that an injustice has been done. By the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Tientsin, it is certainly guaranteed that a Chinese convert may peaceably teach the Christian doctrine anywhere in the empire; and as the American missionaries sent this teacher to Nan Ch'ang-fu, they may properly bring this case to the notice of your government.

I respectfully submit it to your consideration whether the authorities at Nan Chang-fu shall not be notified that proceedings like that now complained of shall not be repeated.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 217.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 24, 1881. (Received November 19.)

SIR: It will be remembered by the Department that Sir Thomas Wade has been charged by the diplomatic body here with the conduct of the negotiations in their behalf with the Tsung-li Yamên concerning a proposed substitution of an addition to the present import duty in place of the lekin taxes, to which goods carried into the interior are now subjected.

I have the honor to forward to you herewith copies of a communication from the British minister to the Tsung-li Yamên and their reply. I received the papers September 7; since that time no further progress has been made.

You will observe that the British minister, by the instruction of his colleagues, pressed the foreign office with the inquiry how far they were prepared to go, in really securing the emancipation of foreign goods from the lekin burdens, provided an import duty of 10 per cent. was paid in lieu of the 5 per cent. now levied, and informed them that he and his colleagues could not recommend the adoption of this change to their respective governments, unless certain other provisions asked in their collective note of November, 1879, were conceded.

The Tsung-li Yamên express their readiness to abide by the proposition to accept 10 per cent. import duty and abolish the lekin, but owing to the demand for certain other regulations, defer action for the present.

It has been a tedious and difficult task to bring them to accept a proposition for a 10 per cent. duty in lieu of the present duty and lekin. There is every reason why they should prefer some such change as that suggested, because the import duties collected by the so-called foreign customs all go to the imperial treasury, while the lekin taxes go to the provincial officers. But they have feared that the provincial authorities would not endure the change.

The diplomatic representatives are, without exception, I think, of the opinion that, if certain safeguards can be secured, it is worth the while to try, as an experiment, say for five years, the scheme proposed. But all deem it necessary to have some sort of court of reclamation, in which redress can be gained if lekin is really assessed. Yet, it must be confessed, that it is very doubtful whether, for some time to come, the government can prevent the levying of lekin. The people hate the tax, and would gladly be rid of it. But it is extremely convenient for the local authorities, and the whole weight of the influence of the provincial officials will be thrown in favor of the continuance of it. The temptation for them to collect it in violation of any engagements made by the imperial government will be great—perhaps, in many cases, irresistible. But the lekin assessment now loads foreign goods circulating in the interior with so grevious burdens, and at a certain distance from the ports, in so many cases, becomes prohibitory in effect, that the representatives of the nations which trade with China agree in the belief that some such arrangement as that now under consideration had best be tried for a limited period.

Still, the negotiations have not proceeded far enough to justify any prediction as to the time of their completion.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 217.]

The British minister to the Tsung-li Yamên.

PEKING, July 7, 1881.

The undersigned has the honor to request the attention of the ministers of the Tusng-li Yamên to the following observations on the subject of taxation of imports inland.

The disputes arising out of the taxation of imports protested against by foreign representatives, as in contravention of the treaties, had extended over a long period. They may be said to have commenced, indeed, from the day that the treaties of 1858 came into operation. There had been other questions with regard to which foreign representatives conceived themselves equally entitled to complain. In order to the consideration of these they assembled in Peking in the autumn of 1879, and upon the ——— November of that year they communicated the result of their deliberations to the Prince of Kung in a collective note.

The negotiation of the changes desired was intrusted to different ministers. That regarding inland taxation of imports was committed to the undersigned; his brief, so to speak, being a memorandum in twenty articles, in which the difficulties alleged to embarrass both the import and the export trade were set forth. The memorandum had formed an inclosure in the collective note of the representatives.

So far as imports are concerned, the grounds of complaint exposed in this memorandum might be stated generally under two heads:

(1.) The taxation of imports in excess of treaty provisions both at the ports and inland.

(2.) The neutralization of the safeguards plainly provided by the treaties against excessive taxation inland, either by the act or the neglect of the Chinese authorities. By the treaties but two forms of taxation are recognized. The tariff duty imposed at the port of entry, when the imports are landed, and the transit duty, equal to a half tariff duty, the payment of which is optional, but the certificate attesting payment of which is held under some of the treaties to free the imports certificated from all further imports possibly leviable.

But the Chinese authorities, to state the case summarily, have conceived themselves at liberty to impose inland taxation without limit on imports, and the methods of levying this or other taxation when denounced as objectionable by the foreigners, have been defended by the Chinese authorities as in no way opposed to the treatics. In particular has the interpretation of the transit duty clauses proved matter of endless contention.

In a reply to the collective note dated ———, the Tsung-li Yamên informed the foreign representatives who had signed it that there were three courses open to them, the abandonment of the exterritoriality clauses, in which case natives and foreigners would be treated alike; adherence to the existing treaty provisions, or acceptance of the modifications of treaty stipulations accepted by the late British minister, Sir Rutherford Alcock, in his convention of 1869.

The certainty that it would be in vain to expect acceptance of the first of these propositions by any one of the treaty powers has practically excluded it from consideration, and as regards the second, the undersigned has but expressed the unanimous feeling of his colleagues, when he has declared that nothing would be more satisfactory than adherence to the existing treaties, could but a common understanding be arrived at regarding the meaning of some of their most significant provisions. That such an understanding was clearly impossible, so long as the provisions in question were so differently interpreted by the Government of China and foreign powers.

There remained the convention of 1869 which, though it had been, in some quarters, considered open to objection, was nevertheless admitted to contain much that might be safely accepted. The Tsung-li Yamên manifestly entertained the opinion that this convention must be adopted as a whole or not at all.

It is not necessary here to retrace further the history of the undersigned's conferences with their excellencies the ministers upon the subject. Upon the 29th June, 1880, the undersigned put the following plain questions to their excellencies: Is there no arrangement under which by a single payment of import duty at the port of entry all further charges may be avoided? The object of the undersigned, as he observed, was not more the alleviation of trade from taxation, which the importer regarded as violation of treaty, than the termination of those ever-recurring discussions to which such taxation gives rise.

The answer of their excellencies was in effect that to secure this end, they saw no means but the one, an increase of the import duty.

This involving a reference on the part of the undersigned to his colleagues, and on the part of the Tsung-li Yamên to the provincial governments, a considerable time elapsed before negotiations were resumed. When they were, the position of the question was, in a few words, as follows: It was contended by the Yamên that, from inquiries in the provinces, the lekin now imposed on foreign imports amounted to something like three times the tariff duty. In other words the tariff duty being generally taken to represent some 5 per cent. ad valorem, the lekin and tariff together might be stated at 20 per cent. ad valorem. Their excellencies, after some intermediate propositions, declared themselves ready to advocate a single payment of 11½ per cent. as the equivalent of the present tariff duty plus inland taxation.

The undersigned and his colleagues, being of opinion that if the half tariff duty, now paid only at the option of the importer when he elects to certificate his goods inland, were levied simultaneously with the tariff duty, the Chinese exchequer would receive not only far more than now falls to its share, but to the full as much as it is fair to impose upon imports, were nevertheless prepared to make an effort to meet the Chinese Government. But the rise to 11½ was at once pronounced excessive, and the proposition was rejected accordingly.

The undersigned having vainly suggested 8 per cent., 8½ per cent., or even 9 per cent., as a maximum of increase, was finally given to understand, on the 28th of March last, that their excellencies were prepared to agree to 10 per cent. ad valorem as the amount that should include tariff duty and all other charges.

As their excellencies are aware, the adoption of this or any other change so important depends not only upon the acquiescence of the foreign representatives now in China, but upon the assent of all foreign governments having treaties with China, and as the Chinese secretary and assistant Chinese secretary at the British legation were instructed on the 21st May to intimate to their excellencies, it will be essential that the Tsung-li Yamên should state explicitly to what extent the Chinese Government is prepared to go in the emancipation of the import trade, supposing that foreign governments agree to this last proposition, which is in effect to double the import duty. To state the question in other terms: before they consent to any increase of the taxation to which they believe imports under the present treaties liable, foreign governments will require the most explicit assurance that by such increase imports shall be freed from all other imposts, no matter what their denomination, and no matter in what part of the empire or in whose hands, native or foreign, they may be found.

It may be at the same time considered certain that the increase of the import duty, if sanctioned at all, will not be sanctioned otherwise than as an experiment for a stated term of years. It will be regarded, and had accordingly better be described, as a provisional increase (or an increase upon its trial).

The Chinese Government will be expected to undertake that, if, when the conditions of exemption from further taxation shall have been agreed upon, it can be proved that imports are none the less taxed in excess of the limit agreed to, the excess shall be made good without delay to the party interested; and that to this end some system of joint investigation is to be established.

The Tsung-li Yamên was further reminded on the ——— that there are other provisions claimed for the protection of trade in general in the collective note of November —, 1879, some of which have not been as yet conceded, and the support of the proposition to increase the import duties is not to be counted upon until reasonable satisfaction on these points be secured.

The taxation of opium has of necessity been referred to, both directly and indirectly, in the discussions above referred to, and their excellencies have more than once observed that the trade in opium is exclusively a British question. It has further been urged by their excellencies that its position differs from that of any other item of the import trade within the scope of the collective note, in this, that the undersigned had individually engaged to regulate the taxation of the opium trade.

It is perfectly true that the opium imported into China is almost exclusively the produce of British India. It is also true that the undersigned did independently engage to attempt the regulation of its taxation. But it is none the less true that opium is in the tariff of almost every treaty power, and that, although there is reason to believe that whatever the British Government may eventually agree to regarding opium will not in the end be objected to by any other treaty power, it is perfectly open to any treaty power that may consider its treaty rights insufficiently respected to decline, until they be respected, the adoption of any arrangement affecting opium taxation that may be sanctioned either by Great Britain or any power. As their excellencies are well aware, the undersigned has not used this argument for the purpose of obtaining any advantage for the opium trade, but as one which it behooves the Government of China not to lose sight of when considering the complaints concerning the import trade advanced by the powers in general.

The undersigned has to express his regret that the ministers of the Tsung-li Yamên have had to wait so long for fulfillment of the promise of the undersigned that he would address their excellencies a note in this sense. For the delay which circumstances have made unavoidable, none is responsible but the undersigned.

THOMAS WADE.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 217.]

Ministers of the Tsung-li Yamên to Sir Thomas Wade.

AUGUST 1, 1881.

The ministers are in receipt of a note from the British minister, in which he observes that the negotiation of the changes desired in the matter of inland taxation has been committed to him, and that he was given to understand on the 28th of March last that the ministers were prepared to agree to 10 per cent. ad valorem as the amount that should include both tariff duty and lekin. The adoption of any change so important would, however, depend upon the assent of all foreign governments having treaties with China, and it would be essential that the Tsung-li Yamên should state explicitly to what extent the Chinese Government is prepared to go in the emancipation of the import trade. The change would be tried as an experiment for a stated term of years.

The British minister added that there were other provisions claimed for the protection of trade in the collective note of November, 1879, and that the support of the proposition to increase the import duties is not to be counted upon until satisfaction on these points be secured. Referring to the opium question, the British minister remarked that opium is in the tariff of almost every treaty power, and it is perfectly open to any power to decline the adoption of arrangements affecting opium taxation that may be sanctioned by Great Britain.

The ministers would observe, omitting from present consideration the question of opium, which still remains to be discussed, that foreign goods which have paid import duty at a treaty port are conveyed into the interior under transit certificate, which frees them from all other levies after payment of the transit duty. On the other hand, goods unprovided with transit certificates are liable to duty and lekin at such stations as they may pass. So much is clearly stated in the treaty regulations.

Sir R. Alcock's supplementary convention of 1869 provided that certain commodities of foreign origin, confined to three categories, should circulate freely in treaty port provinces on payment simultaneously of import duty and transit due, but in the case of non-treaty port provinces the commodities having arrived at their place of destination would thenceforth be liable to inland charges in the same manner as native produce.

This arrangement, however, never came into force in consequence of the regretable refusal of the British Government to ratify the convention. The proposition of the British minister, who is now engaged with the conduct of this question, to obviate inconvenient charges by a single payment once for all, is in fact what Sir R. Alcock intended by the simultaneous payment of import duty and transit due, and the ministers of the Yamên proposed at the outset to adopt Sir R. Alcock's project in its integrity. The British minister not agreeing to this, the Yamên were inclined to make some concession, and first proposed a general import duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, and subsequently of 11½ per cent. to cover all levies en route to the place of destination, no matter where. The British minister still held out, until at last the Yamên, in a spirit of accommodation, went so far as to offer a still further reduction to a rate of 10 per cent.

Under the conditions at present existing the import duty of 5 per cent., with the transit duty of 2½ per cent., amounts to a total levy of 7½ per cent. ad valorem on foreign imports. The arrangement proposed would increase the aggregate by no more than the amount of the transit duty, and it would be very unsafe to assume that this addition will compensate the Chinese Government for dues which at present are levied in transitu, or after the goods have passed the place of destination. If, however, on the representation of the several ministers the present proposal should obtain the sanction of the treaty powers, regulations for its enforcement as an experiment during a provisional term would of course be negotiated forthwith by the representatives and the Yamên. The institution of such provisional experiment would, for the moment, be premature, in view of the British minister's remark that "there are other provisions claimed for the protection of trade in the collective note of November, 1879, and the support of the proposition is not to be counted on until (reasonable satisfaction on) these points be secured." Nevertheless, now that the general principle (of the proposed change) has been determined, there is no harm in deferring for a time the discussion of its application in detail.

No. 181.

Mr. Angell to Mr. Blaine.

No. 218.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 27, 1881. (Received November 19.)

SIR: I send you by this mail two copies of a report of the imperial maritime customs on the consumption of foreign opium in China. The statistics are doubtless gathered with as much care as is possible. The result reached is that 10,000,000 catties (a catty is about 1⅓ pounds avoirdupois) of opium is imported, and that this will suffice for the supply of about 1,000,000 smokers, or say one-third of one per cent. of the population. Assuming that the native product of opium is equal to the foreign importation, the conclusion is given that less than one per cent.—that is, less than 3,000,000—are opium-smokers.

Of course, it is impossible to say with accuracy what is the average consumption of a smoker. The belief is largely entertained that in some way the observations made by the customs officers have failed to indicate the extent of the practice of opium smoking. The North China Herald of Shanghai, which is by no means a severe critic of the use of opium in China, says that the report has erred in not taking account of the fact that practically a large amount of the opium is used twice, the ashes being saved and sold for about half the price of new opium. It remarks:

> We have heard it stated by many sensible Chinese that the number of their male friends who smoke opium, as against those who do not, is about seven to three, a calculation sometimes modified to six to four, and our own experience goes to prove that the calculation is not very far astray.

Personal inquiries which I have made would lead me to think that the proportion of smokers in Peking to the whole male population is less than that reported for Shanghai, but certainly much larger than the estimate of the report.

It is impossible to learn how large is the native production of opium. But in some provinces, especially Szechuen and Yunnan, it is very large.

Since a poppy field is said to yield a crop two or three times as valuable as a wheat crop, and the demand for the product is so great, it can readily be seen that nothing but most severe laws, stringently enforced, can prevent the spread of the cultivation of the plant.

What is the treatment of opium by the government? The importation of the drug they cannot at present prevent. For the most part they content themselves with heavy taxation of it after levying a duty of $40 a chest on importation; while in the hands of natives at the port it is often taxed as high as $100. As it travels into the interior it is taxed at the local barriers indefinitely. Since it is the only article imported for which transit passes, freeing articles from further duties in transitu, are not given, it is regarded as lawful prey for tax collectors, official "squeezes," and extortions of all sorts.

There have been cases in which a governor has prohibited the introduction of the drug into his province, but probably such a prohibition was ineffective. When a new magistrate takes office in a city, he often begins in a very virtuous way by issuing a fierce proclamation closing all the opium shops for a while. After a time his moral indignation subsides under the influence of bribes, and gradually the shops open cautiously and remain open till the next magistrate succeeds to the office. One is reminded of the alternations of usage in respect to the enforcement of the Maine law in our cities. But in general, I think it may be said that since many officials are more or less addicted to opium, and find it a convenient source of revenue, the traffic goes on, subject mainly to pecuniary burdens.

Imperial decrees make the use of opium by officials or by soldiers punishable with death, but transgression when punished, as it sometimes is, is visited with a lighter penalty, degradation in the case of officials and dishonorable dismissal in the case of soldiers.

Earnest attempts have been made by the central government and by some of the provincial governors to suppress the cultivation of the poppy. One could quote from the Peking Gazette of the last ten years pages of imperial decrees, commanding the viceroys and governors to punish all who violate the law. The decrees assign as the reasons for prohibiting the growth of the poppy, first, that opium is pernicious, and, secondly, that the cultivation of it leads to a short supply of food. The famine which in 1878 destroyed millions of persons in Shansi and other provinces would have been far less severe, if so many acres had not been given up to the poppy instead of to wheat. Tso-Tsung-Tang, when viceroy, did succeed to a great extent in checking the cultivation of the poppy in Kansuh. Some of the officials say, "Since we must receive the drug from abroad, why should our people not have the profit of raising it?" This is certainly as good reasoning as that of the Christian statesmen and merchants of the West, who say, "Since the Chinese themselves raise opium, why may we not have the profit of selling or of transporting it to them?"

For years many of the leading statesmen and best men in China have been watching with the greatest solicitude the increase of the use of the drug. They would gladly check it. The request for the insertion of the anti-opium clause in our recent treaty is one proof of it. But the obstacles to the extirpation of the use of opium are so formidable that it is not surprising that some should deem it impossible. It is thought by some that certain Chinese statesmen who have been most vigorous in their opposition to opium are disposed to tax it very heavily and let it remain in use. The temptation to compromise in the warfare by an arrangement, which easily replenishes the public treasury is great, it must be confessed. That some men should yield to it need not surprise us. Yet some of the Chinese statesmen believe in the power and the will of the government to check the growth of opium in the country, provided the importation can be arrested. When we consider the docility of the Chinaman, we may believe that if importation should be stopped and a vigorous emperor should undertake the work of stopping the cultivation of the poppy and the use of the drug, very much could be done towards so desirable a result. I think that neither the imperial government nor the provincial governors are now doing as much as they might and ought to do in this direction. Still the Chinese ministers have more than once expressed to me a strong desire to meet the difficulties of the case and overcome them.

In my last visit to the Tsung-li Yamên, Prince Kung said to me that if the importation from India could be stopped, the government could and would suppress the growth of it at home. Surely good men of all lands and the governments of states which call themselves Christian may well strengthen the hands of the Chinese Government in every act which tends to rid China of what all must regard as a great calamity.

It is a cause of just congratulation that the United States have taken the initiative in showing that one nation at least is ready to abstain from bringing to her ports the drug which is destroying the strength and the happiness of so many Chinamen and drawing heavily on the financial resources of the nation which it is cursing.

SIR: Mr. Angell's dispatch No. 199, of August 18, last, has been received. It reports an attack upon the American mission at Tsi-nan-fu, and incloses his correspondence relating thereto.

In approving Mr. Angell's action, I am free to say that the protection of American missionaries must be trusted to the minister at Peking, and at this great distance the matter left largely to his discretion.

It seems, however, that the Chinese Government should, in a spirit of impartial justice, at once put a stop to these uncalled-for and unprovoked annoyances, by promptly punishing the offenders, and by affording our citizens every possible protection in the future.

SIR: Adverting to previous correspondence respecting the concession to the Great Northern Telegraph Company by the Government of China, I have now to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Angell's No. 201, of August 18, last, further relating to the telegraph monopoly scheme.

Mr. Angell's course in the matter is approved, and, in the judgment of the Department, the time has arrived when the Chinese Government should be asked to give more emphatic and distinct definition touching that concession, and to state upon what terms and conditions China will, in future, grant permission to American companies to lay cables. Admitting it to be a hypothetical question, as inferred from Prince Kung's reply to Mr. Angell, which he inclosed, inasmuch as such companies are not yet formed, still the United States is anxious to know whether the proposed contract with the Great Northern Company is intended to be an exclusive monopoly for all times, or, if not, its precise nature.

This government would certainly view, in an unfriendly light, any act of the Chinese Government which precluded our people from an equal participation with the citizens or subjects of any other friendly power, in such enterprises, mutually beneficial to the interests of both countries. We would greatly regret to see China bestow upon any corporation these exclusive privileges. I deem it but just to say that such a policy would not only be in direct opposition to her own interest, but strongly in contrast to that more liberal spirit which should animate and control the Chinese Government in its intercourse with foreigners.

You will present the subject to that government and report the result of your application to the Department, for its information.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE LEGATION OF CHINA AT WASHINGTON.

No. 187.

Chen Lan Pin to Mr. Evarts.

CHINESE LEGATION,

Washington, November 10, 1880. (Received November 12.)

SIR: Referring to an interview which I had with your excellency on the 5th instant and in which the recent disturbances at Denver, Colo., were mentioned, I have now the honor to state that I have just received advices from some of the Chinese residents of Denver, which show that the affair was of a very serious character; that many of the Chinese were imprisoned in jail for their protection; that several were wounded, and one killed. The property destroyed by the mob is estimated to be from $20,000, to $30,000 in value.

As you kindly promised an investigation of the matter, I will ask that the Government of the United States extend its protection to the Chinese in Denver, and see that the guilty persons are arrested and punished, and it would seem to be just that the owners of the property wantonly destroyed shall in some way be compensated for their losses.

The Chinese in Denver went there under treaty stipulations and engaged in labor and trade, but now unfortunately they are subjected to such persecutions that they cannot peacefully labor, and the destruction of their property has interrupted the prosecution of their business. How this unhappy condition of affairs shall be amended, the Chinese be protected and such occurrences prevented in the future, the general government and the local authorities must decide.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

CHEN LAN PIN.

No. 188.

Mr. Evarts to Chen Lan Pin.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 30, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 10th of November last, in relation to the recent unfortunate occurrences at Denver, Colo., by which certain Chinese residents of that city suffered very serious injuries in their persons and property, were subjected to wanton and undeserved outrage, and one of their number killed.

These sad consequences resulted from the conduct and action of a lawless mob, who, for a brief period, during the 31st of October, and the night following that day obtained the mastery over the law and the local authorities. The attack of the mob appears to have been, at first, indiscriminately directed against the peaceable and law-abiding of the whole community.

I embrace this oportunity to state for your own information and that of the Chinese Government, which you worthily represent, that the President upon the receipt of the information that in this outbreak of mob violence the Chinese residents of Denver had been made a special object of the hatred and violence of that lawless mob, felt as much indignation and regret as could possibly be felt by yourself or your government, and I need scarcely assure you that, in common with my colleagues in the executive government, I shared fully in this sentiment of the President.

You express, in your note, the desire that this government shall extend protection to the Chinese in Denver, and see that the guilty persons are arrested and punished; and you add that "It would seem to be just that the owners of the property wantonly destroyed shall, in some way, be compensated for their losses."

It affords me pleasure to assure you that not only in Denver, but in every other part of the United States, the protection of this government will always be, as it always has been, freely and fully given to the natives of China resident in the country, in the same manner and to the same extent as it is afforded to our own citizens, As to the arrest and punishment of the guilty persons who composed the mob at Denver, I need only remind you that the powers of direct intervention on the part of this government are limited by the Constitution of the United States. Under the limitatons of that instrument, the Government of the Federal Union cannot interfere in regard to the administration or execution of the municipal laws of a State of the Union, except under circumstances expressly provided for in the Constitution. Such instances are confined to the case of a State whose power is found inadequate to the enforcement of its municipal laws and the maintenance of its sovereign authority; and even then the Federal authority can only be brought into operation in the particular State, in response to a formal request from the proper political authority of the State. It will thus be perceived that so far as the arrest and punishment of the guilty parties may be concerned, it is a matter which, in the present aspect of the case, belongs exclusively to the government and authorities of the State of Colorado. In this connection, it is satisfactory to be able to note, with approval, the conduct of the public authorities of Colorado, and of the people of Denver, on the unfortunate occurrence in question. It was seen then as it always is in such outbreaks that the fury of the brutal and lawless, who compose such mobs, is ultimately turned against the weak and defenseless, and it is creditable alike to the appreciative sense of public duty of the authorities of Colorado and the humane instincts of the citizens of Denver, that their first care in this emergency (involving as it did for the moment, the lives and property of all alike), was the protection and safety of the Chinese residents, whose presence seemed to serve as a special incitement to the passions of the mob. And this brings me to the suggestion of your note, "That the owners of the property wantonly destroyed shall, in some way, be compensated for their losses."

It seems superfluous to recall to your attention the fact, but too well attested by history, that on occasions, happily infrequent, often without motive in their inception, and always without reason in their working, lawless persons will band together and make up a force in the character of a mob of sufficient power and numerical strength to defy, for the moment, the denunciations of the law and the power of the local authorities. Such incidents are peculiar to no country. Neither the United States nor China are exempt from such disasters. In the case now under consideration it is seen that the local authorities brought into requisition all the means at their command for the suppression of the mob, and that these means proved so effective that within twenty-four hours regular and lawful authority was re-established, the mob completely subdued, and many of the ringleaders arrested.

Under circumstances of this nature when the government has put forth every legitimate effort to suppress a mob that threatens or attacks alike the safety and security of its own citizens and the foreign residents within its borders, I know of no principle of national obligation, and there certainly is none arising from treaty stipulation which renders it incumbent on the Government of the United States to make indemnity to the Chinese residents of Denver, who in common with citizens of the United States, at the time residents in that city, suffered losses from the operations of the mob. Whatever remedies may be afforded to the citizens of Colorado or to the citizens of the United States from other States of the Union resident in Colorado for losses resulting from that occurrence, are equally open to the Chinese residents of Denver who may have suffered from the lawlessness of the mob. This is all that the principles of international law and the usages of national comity demand.

This view of the subject supersedes any discussion of the extent or true meaning of the treaty obligations on the part of this government toward Chinese residents, for it proceeds upon the proposition that these residents are to receive the same measure of protection and vindication under judicial and political administration of their rights as our own citizens.

In communicating to you the views of this government in the premises, I have pleasure in adding the assurance that it will upon every occasion, so far as it properly can, give its continued attention to every just and proper solicitude of the Chinese Government in behalf of its subjects established here under the hospitality of our treaties.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my distinguished consideration,

WM. M. EVARTS.

CHINESE LEGATION,
Washington, January 21, 1881.

SIR: Referring to the recent riot and attack upon the Chinese residents in Denver, Col., I had the honor to address you a note on the 10th of November last, stating the facts petitioned to me from the Chinese there; and at the same time I had authorized the consul-general at San Francisco to appoint a member to proceed to Denver for making investigations on this subject.

According to the report of Mr. F. A. Bee, Chinese consul, who went personally to Denver and investigated thoroughly the case, I learn that the occurrence of the riot was owing to the incompetency of the authorities, and that it resulted in a homicide and the wholesale robbery of the property of the Chinese. Mr. Bee also procured the statements of the losses sustained by the Chinese, each signed by the individual sufferer; a copy of the verdict of the jury, and the evidence of the witnesses taken before the coroner's jury at the inquest over the dead body of Look-Young, otherwise Sing Le; and the statement of Mr. Pomeroy.

The above-named documents were forwarded to me by the consul-general at San Francisco, and while I was preparing to send you copies of the same, I received your note of the 30th ultimo, which I read and considered carefully. I find some parts of it highly gratifying, and some which I do not quite comprehend. Allow me, sir, therefore to mention to you what these are.

It is stated in your note that "these Chinese residents are to receive the same measure of protection and vindication under judicial and political administration of their rights as our own citizens," and that "our government will, upon every occasion, as far as it properly can, give its continued attention to every just and proper solicitude of the Chinese Government in behalf of its subjects established here," and "not only in Denver, but in every other part of the United States, the protection of this government will always be, as it always has been, freely and fully given to the natives of China resident in the country, in the same manner and to the same extent as it is afforded to our own citizens," and that "the President, upon the receipt of the information that in this outbreak of the mob violence, the Chinese residents of Denver had been made a special object of the hatred and violence of the lawless mob, felt much indignation and regret, and that in common with my colleagues in the executive government, I shared fully in the sentiment of the President."

The above extracts indicate the friendly and kind feeling of your government, and I need not assure you that I feel gratified by their avowal, and that my government on learning of them will share that sentiment with me.

As regards the arrest and punishment of the persons guilty of destroying life and property, it is stated in your note that "the brutal and lawless composed such mob." It is clear that these guilty persons are detested throughout the country, and ought to be punished severely in order to give a warning against similar recurrences. But I regret to learn from your note that the powers of direct intervention on the part of the United States Government are limited by the Constitution

It appears to me that treaties as well as the Constitution are the supreme law of this land. The Chinese residents who were subjected to the wanton outrage of the mob, came to this country under the right of treaties between China and the general Government of the United States, and not with Colorado or any individual State.

Thus the case under consideration should be a question of intercourse between China and the United States, and different from that to be dealt with under the ordinary internal administration of a State. It was with this view that I had in my last note requested you to cause this case to be examined. But I fail to learn from your note the number of the guilty persons that have been arrested, and how they have been punished or dealt with, and how the general Government of the United States has exercised, or intends to exercise, its power in executing the treaty obligations to protect the Chinese. Indeed I cannot see where these residents should seek for protection.

As regards the indemnity of losses of property, I noted from your dispatch that:

> Such incidents are peculiar to no country, and as the local authorities brought into requisition all the means at their command for the suppression of the mob, you know of no principle which renders it incumbent on the Government of the United States to make indemnity to the Chinese residents.

It is therefore manifest, whether the indemnity shall be made or not, depends upon whether the local authorities had brought into requisition all the means for the suppression of the mob. According to the report of investigation, I learn that the Chinese residents of Denver have been made a special object of the hatred, violence, and bitter persecution of the lawless mob, which is quite different from the sudden attack of a band of depredators directed against the whole community of the place, involving (as you have intimated) for the moment the lives and property of all alike; and that the local authorities knew well at the beginning of the outbreak that this mob was directed solely against the Chinese; but instead of meeting the mob with a proper force, they ordered the firemen to throw water on them, and took no measures to cause the immediate arrests of the rioters then and there; and during the prevalence of the riot they put the Chinese in jail, and most of them, as it is asserted, remained there three days for safety, and no guard was placed over their property or places of business; thus the mob had free access to rob at their leisure. These are real facts, known to all. I beg to call your attention to the following verdict of the coroner's jury:

> The evidence shows that the said mob could have been suppressed by the regular force had they fearlessly arrested the ringleaders; but which, owing to the disorganized condition of the police force of the city and the incompetency and inefficiency of its government by the proper authority and the failure of the county authorities to render the necessary aid and assistance required in such emergencies, the mob assumed such proportions as culminated in the destruction of human life and the disgrace of the city in not affording protection to life and property.

This verdict shows clearly that the local authorities had not brought into requisition all the means for the suppression of the mob. The treaty between China and the United States says:

> ARTICLE I. There shall be, as there has always been, peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Taching Empire and their people respectively. They shall not insult or oppress each other, &c.

The Chinese residents came to this country under the right of the treaty, and were peaceably pursuing their calling. In this present case there was no other cause for the murderous outrage than the hatred of the mob which brought on them the loss of life and property. The local officials failed to render necessary, timely, and proper protection to the innocent sufferers at the beginning and greater part of the outbreak, nor have they since exerted their utmost in the recovery of the plundered goods and making reparations for their losses. I do not see that this can be considered as full protection according to the treaty stipulations.

I have the honor to send you herewith two copies of Consul Bee's reports and other papers, and requesting you again that you will be so good as to take the matter into your impartial consideration, and that you will deal with this case in a reasonable and satisfactory manner, justifiable to the moral sense, and when you reach a conclusion I hope you will favor me with a reply, that I may report to my government.

Accept, sir, &c.,

CHEN LAN PIN.

Report of F. A. Bee, Chinese consul.

HIS IMPERIAL CHINESE MAJESTY'S CONSULATE,
San Francisco, December 8, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to report to your excellency that in accordance with your instructions given me to "visit the city of Denver, State of Colorado, and investigate the acts of a mob that destroyed the lives and property of Chinese subjects residing there on the 31st day of October, 1880, and communicate the result of such investigation to you."

In conformity therewith, I left this consulate on Tuesday, November 23, arriving at Denver at midnight of the 27th, having been detained en route twenty hours by snow storms. Returning, I left Denver December 1, arriving here on the 5th, having been delayed twenty-four hours by extreme cold weather and snow storms.

The city of Denver is distant by rail from San Francisco 1,530 miles; the city proper has a population of nearly 40,000 souls, including about 450 Chinese.

Immediately upon my arrival, I called a meeting of the resident Chinese and made known to them my mission as well as your instructions, requesting that they should promptly furnish me a true and correct statement of their losses by the mob of October 31, 1880. In due time and in compliance with my request I received one hundred and forty-one vouchers of losses in detail, each article lost or destroyed, as well as money, being given, and value carried out. To obviate and condense this large number of claims I caused to be made a balance-sheet of the true total of each claim, requiring each one to make oath to its correctness after signature. I herewith transmit to your excellency these sworn statements, numbered respectively from 1 to 141.

That you may see what the property lost generally consists of, I refer you to claims No. 1 and from 136 to 141; the articles being specified will give you a good idea of all.

To further carry out your requests, I called upon prominent citizens of Denver to obtain information as to the cause that led to this mob violence against the Chinese, its origin, &c.

For a full and correct (as I was informed) history of the outrage, I call your excellency's attention to Document A, consisting of four pages of printed matter, extracts from the press of Denver giving full details published the day following the riot. Also Document B, containing the statement of M. M. Pomeroy, esq., a prominent citizen of Denver, to whose endeavors may be credited what action was taken to quell the riot, however weak and unsuccessful.

To enable you to judge as to the action of the city and county authorities towards the punishment of the leaders in this riotous proceeding, I procured after considerable delay the evidence of several witnesses, taken before the coroner's jury at the inquest over the dead body of Look Young. (See Document C.) Page 1 contains the verdict or findings of the jury. I call your attention therein to the strong language used towards the authorities.

Your attention is respectfully called to my letter to their excellencies, the Chinese ministers, giving the particulars in reference to the deceased Chinaman, place of nativity, age, &c.

I desire to call your attention to the case of Wong Tan Chung, whose claim for losses is numbered 86. He received most brutal treatment from the mob; a rope was placed about his neck, and he was dragged through the street, at the same time being beaten and bruised in a most cruel manner, and would no doubt have been murdered had not a citizen cut the rope and thus enabled him to escape from his would-be murderers. Many other cruel deeds might be enumerated. I was informed that seven Chinamen were temporarily stopping in Denver over Sunday (the day of the riot), intending to leave on Monday for China; that they came from the Black Hawk mine, where they had been engaged in mining; each one had from $700 to $1,000 in money, all of which was taken from them by the mob, as well as having their personal effects destroyed. These men had left Denver when I arrived, and I could not get such information as would enable me to present to you their loss. I would suggest that efforts be made to find their present place of residence.

I learned from an officer of the city government of Denver that upwards of 400 Chinese were placed in the county prison and kept there for three days as a measure of precaution. In fact during the prevalence of the riot 150 were taken out of their houses by citizens and placed in jail. As no guard was placed over their property or places of business the mob had free access to rob at their leisure.

The utter incompetency of the authorities to put down the mob was evident, and such was the opinion expressed to me by all.

I took occasion to call upon the mayor of Denver (Mr. Sporis), with the view of obtaining further information in this connection. In this I failed, as the whole interview was taken up by the mayor in describing to me how he dispersed the mob by the use of water. To quote his words: "When I found that they were determined to kill as well as rob, I ordered the firemen to throw the water upon them, which made them scatter."

Thus you can judge what protection the Chinese residents of Denver had from its officials when they were being robbed and murdered by a drunken mob.

In this connection I call your attention to the fact that the entire police force of the city consists of only 15 men, with no discipline or organization to cope with an emergency; but the facts show that the mob had no opposition from 2 o'clock until 10 p. m., when their murderous work was complete.

I also called upon his excellency Governor Pitkin, but found him engaged with the State board of canvassers, and therefore failed to see him.

In reference to the cause that brought about this riot, there was but one opinion among all classes of good citizens—that the Chinese residents had given no cause for the outrage, but, on the contrary, were law-abiding and peaceable. My attention was directed to the fact that not one of the 400 resident Chinese had ever been before the courts of Denver for the crime of theft; therefore the only object the mob had was rapine and murder.

I have, &c.,

F. A. BEE,
His Imperial Chinese Majesty's Consul.

His Excellency CHEN SHU TANG,
His Imperial Chinese Majesty's Consul-General, San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. Bee to the Chinese ministers.

SIRS: I have the honor to inform your excellencies that I have obtained the following facts in reference to the Chinaman who was so brutally murdered by the mob at the city of Denver, State of Colorado, on the 31st day of October, 1880.

The name of the deceased was Look Young, and employed at the Sing Lee laundry. His native place is in Hock Sun, about 80 miles from the city of Canton, China. His age was twenty-eight years. He leaves a wife, father, and mother in China, who were wholly dependent upon him for support. Had been a resident of the United States for four years and six months, and had resided in Denver for six months previous to his death.

For your information in relation to his murder please see inclosed statements from the newspapers.

I have, &c.,

F. A. BEE,
His Imperial Chinese Majesty's Consul.

[Inclosure 4.]

Testimony before the coroner's jury sitting on the body of Sing Lee.

STATE OF COLORADO,
County of Arapaho, ss:

An inquisition held at Denver on November 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 15, A. D. 1880, before Thomas Linton, coroner of said county and State aforesaid, on the body of Sing Lee, lying there dead.

The jurors, whose names are hereto subscribed, after having first viewed the body and heard the evidence adduced at the inquest, on their oaths do say:

That the said Sing Lee came to his death at the office of Dr. O. G. Cranston, in the Moffat and Rassler block, in the city of Denver, on the 31st day of October, A. D. 1880, at 8.30 o'clock p. m., from compression of the brain, caused by being beaten and kicked by ——— Corrigan, Ed. Wendell, Fred. Miller, and ——— Krieger, aided and abetted by other parties to the jury at present unknown, at the corner of Arapaho, and Nineteenth, and between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets, in the city of Denver and county and State aforesaid, about 7 o'clock p. m. of said day.

And we further find that the said mob was but the outgrowth of a drunken attack by two or three white men on some Chinese in the rear of their quarters between Blake and Wazee streets, near Sixteenth, and, which the evidence shows, could have been suppressed by the regular police force had they fearlessly arrested the ringleaders; but which, owing to the disorganized condition of the police force of the city, and the incompetency and inefficiency of its government by the proper authority, and the failure of the county authorities to render the necessary aid and assistance required in such emergencies, the mob assumed such proportions as culminated in the destruction of human life and the disgrace of the city in not affording protection to life and property.

Witness the hands of the said jurors, this 15th November, 1880.

THOMAS LINTON, Coroner.

STEPHEN GILL, being duly sworn, says:

I live at 364 Wellon street, and work for Higgins, the ice man. I was present on Arapaho and Sixteenth street on last Sunday eve, and was there when the mayor arrived. I saw the mob there present, and heard the leader of the mob say to throw the Chinaman in the wagon or they would finish him. He was put in the wagon, and I believe he was then dead. I believe the dead body here is the same Chinaman, by his size and general appearance. At the time I saw him in the wagon he was lying crumped up, and bruised on the head and face. The crowd and the leader directed the driver to take the Chinaman down to headquarters and to the undertakers. Some one suggested that they ought to serve the mayor, when he came, in the same way. After the body was taken away the mob fell back, but I don't know where they went. I next saw a mob at the corner of Fifteenth and Arapaho, and they went over towards the Chinese house back of Parham's drug-store. The man whom I considered as the leader was about 5 feet 10 inches high, and rather heavy set, but, I think, had no whiskers. I met, the next day on Wazee street, a man by the name of James McCann, who said to me that, "We cleaned them out yesterday; we gave them hell; God damn them; they have got to go." I don't know the driver of the wagon. The wagon had an oil-cloth top, but no side curtains. It looked like a market wagon. I think I would know the man who made the remark, "They would finish him if he was not taken away," if I would see him again. He had on a dark old-style cloth coat, the balance of his clothes being dark. I have seen the prisoners in the county jail, and I recognize a man there whom I believe to be the man whom I heard make the remarks I have heretofore spoken of. He gave his name as Ed. Trondell.

N. S. GILL.

NICHOLAS G. KENDALL says:

I live at 507 Stout street, this city. I am working at a shoe-store near the corner of Nineteenth and Larimer. On last Sunday I came down town about 7 o'clock from home and saw the mob come from Blake street to Nineteenth street and up Nineteenth street as far as Lawrence. During the time I was behind the mob until near Nineteenth and Holliday and then I went ahead of the mob to the corner of Nineteenth and Lawrence.

They went straight to Sing Lee's house and commenced breaking in the windows. A portion of the mob went into the house in the rear. They proceeded to break up everything and throw it out. There were about ten went into the house. They caught one Chinaman and brought him out with a rope around his neck, and they were dragging with the rope while he was on his back. The Chinaman got the rope off and run around the building and out across the lot. While he was being dragged I saw one man strike him with a chair or table and take down a lamp from a bracket. I don't believe I would recognize the man. The man who struck the Chinaman had on an old-fashioned stiff square-top hat. His clothing was light colored. After going out back I saw the same Chinaman, I believe, across on the other side of the alley on the steps of a brick house attempting to get up the stairs and struggling to release himself from a white man. There were two white women trying to defend the Chinaman, but the white man got possession of the Chinaman, and the crowd then came up and cried, "Cut off his cue; cut off his nose," &c. I saw a man open his pocket-knife when a man said, "Cut off his cue."

I then left and did not see what was done to him until ten or fifteen minutes afterwards. I saw them throw him into the wagon at Eighteenth and Arapaho. The crowd following the wagon went down Arapaho toward Fifteenth street. This is all I saw of the affair. I have seen the prisoners at the jail and at the sheriff's office but I don't recognize any of them as having seen them at the mob. During part of the time spoken of there were with me two men by the name of James Smith and ——— Gilmore who live at Nineteenth and Holliday, and I afterwards saw Smith again at Lawrence and Nineteenth street during the riot.

NICHOLAS G. KENDALL.

Dr. C. C. BRADBURY:

I live at 533 Arapaho street in this city; am a physician. About half past seven last Sunday I was attracted by the noise of the mob, and I went out of the house and down to Nineteenth street, and first met the mob, in the rear of Sing Lee's place. I went into the crowd and saw that one man had the Chinaman (deceased) by the cue, and another had a rope around deceased's neck. They were then moving towards the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho. I made every remonstrance that I could with the mob. I was pushed away repeatedly by them. The mob took deceased to the corner with the avowed purpose of hanging him. When they got there I took hold of the leader and endeavored to persuade them not to hang him; in doing so I was pushed across the ditch. I made my way to deceased and he was pulled out of the ditch by the mob by the rope and by the cue. While being held up by one of the mob his cue was cut off by another. Deceased was at that time nearly insensible, he having been beaten by part of the mob with a large oak stick. At the time his cue was cut off, my wife and Mrs. Cale then stepped between the deceased and the mob. The crowd then fell back except these two leaders. I grappled one of the leaders and released the Chinaman (deceased) and with the help of some parties who appeared on the ground he succeeded in getting across the street when he was again seized by the mob. They then dragged him down Arapaho toward Eighteenth by the rope and the collar or the remainder of his cue. About half way between Eighteenth and Nineteenth on Arapaho, and while near the fence they stopped again and commenced beating and kicking him. I again made my way to him, and while they were beating him I got between one of the leaders and deceased again. One of the leaders (the short one), then told me to get out of the way or he would kill me, and at that time one of the crowd struck me from behind three times on the side of the head with his fist. At that time I was standing between one of the leaders and the deceased and leaning over the deceased when the blood from deceased spurted over my clothing. Deceased was then on his knees held in that position by one of the leaders who was kicking him and the other was pounding him on the head with his fists. I then got deceased released again and he was grasped by some young men whom I had urged to assist and take around the corner, and while I was between the principal leader and deceased, he was thrown into a wagon and taken away down Arapaho street, and I did not see him again.

I have seen the prisoners in the jail, but I cannot positively say that I recognize any of them as members of that mob. One of them answers the description of one of the leaders except in height.

I have seen two prisoners in the sheriff's office and am rather positive they are the two leaders of the mob above spoken to.

C. C. BRADBURY.

LEWIS RICH:

I live at 212 Tenth street, and am a newsboy. I have lived in Denver two years. I saw the mob at the corner of Wazee and Sixteenth streets last Sunday, and on Blake and Seventeenth. While I was there the water was thrown on the mob and they dispersed. I then left and returned about half-past five to Wazee and Sixteenth streets, and saw that all the Chinese quarters were destroyed, and they were in charge of the police. There were a good many boys and men standing around. After I left there Henry Eichoff and I went up to Nineteenth and Arapaho, where the mob were then collected. The first thing I saw was the mob in charge of a Chinaman near a lamp-post, at corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho. I had first seen them take the Chinaman from the rear of the house to the lamp-post. He had been beaten and was all bloody. One man was holding him by the cue, and I heard him say, "I have got his cue." I saw a man also with a hatchet; he was a short man. The man who cut off the cue was tall and wore a stiff hat, but crushed down at the top. Some of the crowd wanted to release him and the tall man hallooed for a rope to hang him. The short man wanted to kill him. I think I would know the two men if I was to see them. I did not know any of the men in the mob.

I have been over to the sheriff's office and seen the prisoners there and recognize the tall man as the man who cut off the cue and called for the rope to hang him, but I cannot say positively that the small man was the other. The tall one I afterwards saw carrying off clothing from the Chinese house in the rear of the Grand Central Hotel, between 8 and 10 o'clock p. m. This house was destroyed by the same mob that attacked Sing Lee's house at the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho.

LEWIS RICH.

DR. O. G. CRANSTON:

I live at 545 Curtis, and am a physician. On last Sunday night about half-past eight or nine o'clock, the body of a man was brought in a wagon to the hall in front of my office. I examined him and found him still alive, and he was carried up into my room (No. 13 Moffatt and Kassler block) and laid on a lounge, and I went to work to try and resuscitate him by giving him stimulants. I found a cut on the left side of his head through the scalp clear to the skull. As far as examined I did not consider the skull fractured. By rubbing and counter-irritants we succeeded in raising his pulse and he breathed easier. He had a wound on his forehead, over the right eye, and the right side of his face was swollen considerably. His teeth were mostly all loose, and we took out some which were entirely broken out. He was bruised all over the body as though he had been kicked. His feet and hands and limbs to his body were cold, and he was in a cold sweat when brought there. The indications were that he was hurt internally and probably some rupture of a blood vessel. I think the cause of his death was concussion of the brain. There was no fracture of the skull, but concussion frequently occurs from a jar of the brain, as being struck by a broad instrument, jarring and paralyzing the brain. There were marks on his neck as though caused by strangulation, but don't think that the cause of his death. I attended him to near his death in company with Dr. Park and Dr. Coburn. He was in my office about one and a half hours before he died.

O. G. CRANSTON, M. D.

HENRY EICHOFF:

I live on Fifteenth, near the bridge; I am fifteen years old; I am a newsboy Last Sunday I saw the crowd on Fifteenth and Blake about dusk. I afterwards went up to the corner of Nineteenth and Lawrence and saw the mob have a Chinaman at the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho, and heard them crying to hang him. I had followed the crowd to see what they were going to do, and I heard them say, "Now for Nineteenth and Lawrence." When I got to Nineteenth and Lawrence, I saw that the windows were broken in, and they had run the Chinese out, and the crowd had the deceased at the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho at a lamp-post, and were threatening to hang him, and were calling for a rope. They then told him to run for his life, and he started to run, and he was moaning as he ran, and the crowd followed and struck him, and caught him again between Eighteenth and Nineteenth, on Arapaho. They afterwards threw him into a wagon at the corner of Eighteenth and Arapaho. I heard some one say, "Cut off his cue," and I heard the large man say, "I have; I have got it in my pocket." This man had on a stiff hat. I afterwards saw this same man carrying away clothing from the Chinese house in the rear of Grand Central hotel. I had seen this man striking and kicking the deceased at Arapaho and Nineteenth, and between Eighteenth and Nineteenth on Arapaho. He took the clothing down Seventeenth street past the Grand Central Hotel. I have seen two men in the sheriff's office but don't recognize them as having seen them in the mob. I did not see the rope on the Chinaman's neck. From the corner of Arapaho and Nineteenth the Chinaman was released and told to run for his life, and started to run, but was overtaken about halfway to Eighteenth and seized again by the mob and beaten again. He ran and was dragged to Eighteenth, and was there thrown into the wagon, and the wagon started down Arapaho towards the 'bus barn. I saw the same man who seemed to be the leader at Arapaho and Nineteenth down at the Chinese house in the rear of the Grand Central Hotel carrying away clothes under his arm down past the Grand Central. I followed the crowd down to the Grand Central from Arapaho and Nineteenth.

HENRY EICHOFF.

FRISBER HAYDEN:

I live at the corner of Nineteenth and California, and am a barber. Last Sunday about 6 or 7 o'clock p. m., I was passing the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho on my way home, and saw the mob at that place near the lamp-post in charge of a Chinaman. One of the mob had the Chinaman by the cue and said he would cut his throat, and put his hand in his pocket. Not wanting to see the man's throat cut, I moved away. The man who made the threat had a sandy mustache, and a soft hat, dark coat, rather tall. I don't believe I would recognize him again. I think from his appearance he might have been an Irishman. I saw another man kick the Chinaman while he was down on the ground, and as the Chinaman raised up another man struck him. I then crossed over the street and could not see anything more, but I noticed the Chinaman had wounds on the right side of his head, and the blood was running from the wounds. I noticed an old gentleman with white beard remonstrating with the men who were holding the Chinaman, and one man standing near said to him, to "Stand back," "Go away," and pushed the old man away.

FRISBIE W. HAYDEN.

ALEX'R ELY:

I live at 289 Twentieth street. I am collector for James Duff, and agent for Mr. Horr's property, occupied recently by the deceased on Lawrence and Nineteenth. Last Sunday eve, about 7 o'clock, on the corner of Nineteenth and Larimer, I first saw the mob attempting to destroy a Chinese house. After breaking in that building they went to the corner of Nineteenth, and Lawrence. I was knocked down at the corner of Nineteenth and Larimer by a man while I was trying to protect the property for Mr. Horr. I did not know the man, and he escaped in the crowd. I was told by the crowd that if I attempted to assist the Chinese that they would serve me the same as the Chinese. I think my assailant was an Irishman. I heard some parties then call out to the mob to come on and they would go to the corner of Lawrence and Nineteenth, and clean out that place. When they got there they attacked Sing Lee's place with axes, hatchets, stones, &c., and broke in the windows and doors. I saw two men with hatchets, and one of them took the hatchet from his overcoat pocket.

(2.) One of these men with hatchets I saw seize the Chinaman in the rear of the building, and drag him to the lamp-post at the corner of Arapaho and Nineteenth. I heard him say he was going to take the town in and kill every damned son of a bitch of a Chinaman he could find. I saw the same man cut off the cue of the Chinaman. This man was a dark complexioned man, tall, with dark beard and mustache, and about thirty-five or forty years of age.

(3.) I saw another man assisting in dragging the Chinaman by the arm. He was a short man, sandy complexioned, dark coat, dark brown pants, and black soft hat, short stubby whiskers. I have been over to the sheriff's office, and have seen two prisoners there, and I recognize one of the prisoners there as the tall man I have heretofore spoken of (Corrigan). He was the third man who entered Sing Lee's building and found deceased under the lounge and commenced beating him, and dragged him out and said, "Here is one of them, the son of a bitch; we will kill him." He helped drag him out by the collar, and two others assisted and got him into the back yard, and there they beat him again. They then got the clothes-line, and Corrigan said, "We will hang him to the tree," and the others said to hang him to the lamp-post. They dragged him by the rope which they had put around his neck, across the ditch and street to the lamp-post, and a dark-complexioned man went to the lamp-post to throw the rope over, and a lady present begged them not to hang him. I also asked them not to hang him, and they said they would hang me if I did not keep still. I have been to the county jail, and among the prisoners I recognize a man there as the same man as heretofore marked No. 2. I also saw another man there that I have heretofore spoken of as No. 3 I also saw another man there (Craigen), that I recognize as having seen at the head of the mob on Larimer street. He is a tall young man, no whiskers. He was present aiding the mob and throwing into the house on Larimer street. He gave his name as Gregory (Craiger) at the jail. The crowd at Larimer street then shouted to go to Lawrence street, and hallooed for Hancock. When I left the lamp-post where they were trying to hang Sing Lee, I did not see anything more. I heard the man described as No. 2 tell Sing Lee they were going to kill him.

ALEX. EALY.

FRANK STANTON:

I live at 497 Arapaho street, and am a baker; I saw the mob first at the corner of Nineteenth and Larimer, about 7 o'clock in the evening, on their way to Sing Lee's place. I went home and returned in a short time, and saw the crowd in possession of a Chinaman whom they were dragging toward the lamp-post; I followed the mob, and saw them attack Sing Lee's place. When they got him to the lamp-post, I first noticed two men in particular; one was a tall man with a light mustache, a dark hat, and dark clothes; the other man was short and heavy set, dark clothing. They had hold of the Chinaman, and were beating and kicking him; the tall man I saw cut off the cue. I then saw them dragging him toward Eighteenth street. These two men and the crowd were shouting to hang him. I saw several ladies there trying to persuade the crowd not to kill him. I have been over to the sheriff's office, and seen the prisoners there, but I do not recognize any of them as having seen them before; I recollect seeing Dr. Bradbury in the crowd trying to persuade the mob to release the Chinaman, and he finally succeeded in getting him away, and into a wagon, and got him away.

FRANK STANTON.

GEO. C. HICKEY:

I live at the Taney House, 341 Holladay street, and am a printer. I saw the mob on Blake street, between Sixteenth and Seventeenth streets, when the water was thrown on them. The mob still remained there, and I came to Hop Lee's at 416½ Blake street, and remained there half an hour. The small boys commenced throwing stones at the windows, and then the men commenced kicking in the doors and windows. I then went to the rear of the house, and Officer Ryan and a citizen were there trying to keep back the crowd. A. Tom then came out and said to get carriages and a policeman, and they would go away with us. The mob then threw stones so fast we had to retreat from the building. Another man and myself then went into the building, and Ryan and a citizen were trying to beat back the mob. I went through the house to the front to admit a policeman, and it being fastened, it had to be broken open to admit them. After the officer came in I went to the sleeping room and found there and urged them to run out. They all did so but Ah Chung, who remained and hid under the table. The mob then broke past the officers at the door and got into the building and found Ah Chung and put a rope around his neck and threw him and dragged him out. I followed him out, and Officer Ryan tried to release Ah Chung, but being unable, some one cut the rope. Ryan and the citizen then ran him across the lot to Seventeenth street and down Holladay until again stopped by the mob. We got him into a doorway, the door being fastened, near Sixteenth.

The sheriff then ordered the mob to disperse, and Ryan, the citizen, and Ah Chung then moved on. I kept behind the party down Sixteenth street and into a place in the rear of the American House. I then went up to my room and changed clothes and returned to the scene, which was then on Wazee street attacking the Chinese houses in that quarter. The mayor and a squad of police then appeared and fired several shots, when the mob fell back. Two specials were left, and the main body of police left. The mob, after completing the destruction after the police left, darted for Eighteenth and Larimer, going up Wazee to Seventeenth, thence to Blake, thence to Nineteenth. On the way to Nineteenth they attacked and demolished two Chinese houses. They then shouted, "For Nineteenth and Lawrence!" I knew they were going to Sing Lee's, and I ran ahead to warn him, and when I got here and called to him he locked the door and would not come out. The mob then came and attacked the place with sticks and stones, and commenced breaking in the windows and doors in the rear. I went around to the front of the house, and while I was there they broke open the building, and one of the mob entered through a window, and I followed him. The crowd by that time had forced the back door and entered. I saw Sing Lee on his knees, and when he saw me he came and dropped down in front of me for protection, and I endeavored to shield him and prevent them from putting the rope around his neck. The crowd then commenced kicking him, and said I was a damned Chinaman, and they would hang me if I did not get away, and attempted to put the rope over my neck.

I noticed one man in the crowd who was very active; tall, light hat, rather poorly dressed, and, I think, an Irishman. I did not notice any other one particularly so that I can describe them. I saw them take Sing Lee out with a rope around his neck, but could not recognize any of the men who had charge of him. They caught Ah Sin and took him out, and I followed and I hallooed to him to run, and he ran and I pulled my revolver and kept the crowd back until Ah Sin was hidden away in a coal-shed, and I afterwards washed him and brought him to headquarters. I saw the mob pounding Sing Lee with cord wood, but I could not get to him on account of the crowd. I have seen the body of Sing Lee at the coroner's, and identified it as Sing Lee's. The crowd called me a damned half Chinaman, and said they would hang me if I did not clear out. They were shouting for Hancock.

GEO. C. HICKEY.

GEORGE MILLIGAN:

I am fourteen years old and live in the alley between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth and Lawrence and Larimer. About one o'clock I came down Larimer street and I saw a crowd of people running down the alley by the American House. I did not see anything there, but that night about 7 o'clock I saw the mob up on Nineteenth and Lawrence. I went up to the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho, and saw the crowd dragging the Chinaman by the cue across the street from the Chinese house at the corner of Nineteenth and Lawrence toward the corner of Nineteenth and Arapaho. They were taking him to hang him to a tree, as the crowd announced. A lady stood by and requested that they release him, and after beating him with clubs and kicking him in the face they released him, and after letting him run a short distance they again caught him and beat him again, and he was again released, and he ran to the corner of Eighteenth and Arapaho and fell. He was there thrown into a wagon that came along and the driver directed to take him to the jail.

I did not see any one in the mob that I knew personally, but I saw one man with long hair and wide-brimmed hat, rather tall, and think I should know him if I should see him again. A man there by the name of Burke whom they called ("Captain") "Colonel" Burke, on horseback, was hallooing to "Hang the Chinese," and I heard him say to the crowd that "He was the first man to go to a Chinese house." He announced that his name was not "Colonel" Burke, that it was "Mr." Burke. He rode a bay or brown horse and very fine appearance. This man Burke was of medium size. When I first saw Burke he was coming up Nineteenth toward Arapaho, and was crying to "Come on, boys," "Hang the Chinese." He was in front of the mob, and when the mob got the Chinaman out, he dismounted and another man held his horse. I next saw Burke with the crowd, on his horse, with the mob going down toward the Clifton House. After the Chinaman was put in the wagon, I saw him in front of the mob at the Arapaho-street school-house. The crowd were continually shouting for "Hancock," and "Down with the Chinese," and I heard Burke shouting to the mob to come on.

GEORGE MILLIGAN.

Mrs. W. M. COLE:

I live at 529 Arapaho street. Last Sunday eve, about half-past seven o'clock in the evening, Dr. and Mrs. Bradbury and myself had started down town, and before we reached the corner of Nineteenth, we saw the mob and were told that they had attacked the house of Sing Lee. They came to the lamp-post with the Chinaman with a rope around his neck shouting to hang him, and just as he got to the ditch he fell, as I believe, of strangulation. Mrs. B. and I went into the crowd to try to get him released, but the crowd were so close that we could do nothing. Some one asked Mrs. B. if she wanted to see him hung, and she said "No, and he shall not be hung here." I noticed one boy, whom I believe I recognize as the boy here shown, who was very active and pointed out a place to hang him, and called on them to come on. I heard them shout to cut off the cue and saw one of the men cut it off. He seemed to be nearly insensible. They then got him up and started him off, and I thought they were going to let him go. One man, a large man with a sandy mustache, said "No, kill him; don't let him go." And the crowd surged forward down Eighteenth street, and caught him again. The mob were beating and kicking him all the time, but there seemed to be two principal men doing most of the beating and kicking. The mob were shouting all the time to kill him, and I heard them repeatedly say they were a democratic crew, and they were continually shouting for Hancock.

MRS. W. M. COLE.

T. J. RYAN:

I live at 372 Delgany street, and am a policeman. Last Sunday I first saw the mob at the corner of Sixteenth and Wazee, and I assisted in getting the mob up Sixteenth and into Blake, where the water was thrown on the mob. Judge Welborn then appeared and requested the mob to disperse if they would, and I suggested to Welborn to go ahead and halloo for Hancock, and I thought the crowd would follow, and he went up Sixteenth, and 200 or 300 followed him when he cheered for Hancock. He told the crowd that "To-morrow is the day to vote for Hancock." The balance of the crowd then attacked Hop Lee's house, on Blake, between Sixteenth and Seventeenth, and destroyed it. There was no policeman that I saw present there but myself, and I tried to persuade the mob to cease their attack, but the mob directed me to get away or I would get hurt. The mob in the meantime got a Chinaman out with a rope around his neck, and I attempted to release him. Another man and I then got to the Chinaman, and he cut the rope, and we got the Chinaman from the crowd and started into the alley, and the crowd then got to us again. We succeeded in getting the Chinaman along into the front of Louis's ten-pin alley, when the door was shut against us. Some one then attempted to quiet the mob by addressing the mob, and attracted the attention of the mob, and I got away with the Chinaman down to Sixteenth and down to the American House, where I got the Chinaman into the rear of the hotel.

The mob then came down and attacked the Chinese houses in the rear of the American Hotel, and I went out into the mob and attempted again to pacify the crowd. Some man then broke in the door of the Chinese store, and the mob attempted to get in. Four shots were then fired, and a white man appeared, holding up his arm bleeding, and cried, "See the white man's blood," and the crowd rushed into the house. They then went through the Chinese house near the corner. The mob then moved around to Wazee, and I remained in charge of the house at the alley. I did not see Captain Burke at all, nor did I see any one whom I recognized, as I was so busy that I could not stop to look at any one in particular. The man who was shot in the arm I think was one of the mob. On Wazee street I tried to disperse the crowd from the sidewalk near John's place. I saw a man by the name of Jim Lewis, and I ordered him away also, and he told me "No; I am a 'special' under Spangler;" and I said, "All right," and I did not see him again until about 5 or 6 o'clock in the back part of the Chinese house at the corner of the alley, between Blake and Wazee, when I ordered a man away from a trunk he was trying to get into. I don't know what he was doing, but he was making himself busy there in some way. He had on a broad-brimmed hat, and wears long hair, black coat, and brown mustache and goatee. I was not up to Nineteenth and Arapaho at any time during the attack there, and did not see anything there.

AH SING (through Chee Quong, interpreter):

I live at the corner of Nineteenth and Lawrence. I keep a wash-house. I was in the house last Sunday evening when the mob came, and I was lying under the ironing-table. I saw the parties, but could not recognize them as it was dark. I did not see them take out Sing Lee, as the mob put a rope around my neck and dragged me out of the house, but it was so dark I could not see them to identify them. Sing Lee was in the house at the time the mob entered the house. The mob cut off my cue after they got me outside of the house. I could not identify any of the prisoners if I should look at them. They took me out before they seized Sing Lee.

GEORGE LE CLAIR:

I live at the corner of Thirteenth and Holladay, west Denver, and am a bar-tender. On last Sunday, on Blake between Sixteenth and Seventeenth, on the south side of the street, in the rear of a Chinese house, the same house attacked by the mob, I saw a man by the name of Kinney or McKinney throwing stones and bricks at the building during the attack on the building. He then advanced on the building and urged the crowd to follow, and was shortly after that arrested by Mr. Hawley and taken away, and is now in jail. Another man, who gave his name as Smith, arrested on last Saturday night by Officer Sherman on Blake street, I saw on the Sunday eve of the riot, while myself, Sherman, Welch, and Clarke were bringing two Chinamen from the Chinese house on Blake street above described to the American House; he made an attempt to rescue the Chinese from us, and said, "I will take the God damned Chinamen from them; I am no 'tenderfoot.'" This was near the American House. I afterwards saw this same man at the head of the mob at the corner of Fourteenth and Lawrence when they were dispersed by the officers, and also saw a man with a yellow hound, named Poole, who was also throwing stones, and saw him kicking at the door and break in the windows of the Chinese house above spoken of. He appeared to be very active, and was in the lead of the mob. I also saw a man by the name of Eisenhart, who was mounted and was leading the mob at the corner of Fourteenth and Lawrence, and when the mob came in sight of the Chinese house at Fourteenth and Lawrence, I heard him say to the mob, pointing to the Chinese house, "There is one of them now." After the mob were fired into and dispersed, this man Eiseahart rode up in front of the Chinese house, and he was asked by a party there what he was doing there, and he said he "was working for the city," and when asked his name he said it was none of their business. He was asked to show his badge or authority, and he said he "did not have any and did not need any." He was arrested and taken off his horse and taken to jail by Officers Sherman and Levy. I did not see any attack made or ordered by any one in charge of the police at any place during the day except at Fourteenth and Lawrence, when the police were ordered to fire on the mob.

GEORGE LE CLAIR.

JOHN ASMUSSÉN:

I live at 404½ Wazee street, and keep the saloon known as "John's Place." I was present at my saloon last Sunday, the last of October, when the riot occurred on Wazee street and Sixteenth, near my place, about 2 o'clock. There was in my place at the commencement of the row, George E Shalle and two Chinamen playing pool. Shalle works at 406 Arapaho street. They were playing quietly when three or four men came in who were drunk and went up to the table and commenced to disturb the game. One of the Chinamen asked them to quit; the men then commenced abusing the Chinamen, and I remonstrated with them, and they said they were as good as Chinamen, and they came up to the bar and got some beer. While they were drinking I advised the Chinamen to go out of the house to prevent a row, and they went out at the back door. After a few minutes one of the white men went out at the back door and struck one of the Chinamen without any provocation. Another one of the crowd called to one of the same gang inside to "come on Charley, he has got him," and he then picked up a piece of board and struck at the Chinese, which the Chinese defended against as well as they could, and tried to get away. This was the beginning of the riot. I then closed the doors and would not admit any one, and did not see any more of the riot. These men were strangers to me, and I had never seen them before, nor have not since. I saw Jim Lewis in the saloon at the time the row commenced, and he tried to get out of the back way, which I tried to prevent, but he got out by me and immediately he got out I heard the bricks flying. He tried afterwards to get back, but I would not let him in. The man who went out with Lewis I don't know by name.

Statement of M. M. Pomeroy.

OCTOBER 31, 1880.

Sunday I was in North Denver dining with friends. The first I heard of the riot was about 5 p. m., when Mr. Nichols who had come over from the city, reported that a mob had gathered in Blake street to kill the Chinese, and had been partially quieted. I hastened to the city, left my wife at our home, and then drove to the stables of Elledge & Co., on Holliday street between Sixteenth and Seventeenth. At this time about 3,000 persons were assembled back of these stables, about the houses occupied by Chinese on Blake street; the houses were entirely surrounded by a surging, infuriated mob of brutal cowards, with clubs, stones, &c. They were breaking in windows and doors, cursing, howling, and yelling "Kill the Chinese! Kill the damned heathens! Burn the buildings! Give them hell! Run them out! Shoot them; hang them!" &c.

I saw doors broken, saw men enter the houses and with impromptu torches look for those who inside were hiding; saw clothes and other articles brought out and thieves run away with them.

I appealed to men standing a little back to rush in and save life and property and prevent the starting a conflagration, but those appealed to stood as benumbed or answered by curses and cries, "The Chinese must go!"

Then I saw two men wounded by bricks thrown towards the house, and was glad that two of the rioters were hit. Just then a Chinaman was found in one of the houses and dragged out to be knocked down, kicked, jumped upon, and beaten with clubs by the rioters, who were filling the air with horrid curses, yells, cheers, and cries. A rope was thrown over the head of the Chinaman and the crowd started with him on the run, to the cries of "Hang him! hang him! hang him!"

I saw one policeman trying to beat the mob back, but could not get to him. I then ran to the executive department on Larimer street and found Governor Pitkin in his office, having just come. I asked him if he could do nothing to save the city from destruction and to the preservation of life. He wanted to know what was going on; he said that he could not move, could not call out the militia till called upon by the civil authorities, but offered to go in person and assist the police, appeal to the mob, or do whatever he could to stop the riot. I asked him to remain where he was till I could find the mayor. He agreed, and directed me where to find the office of the mayor on Lawrence street. As I started to go there Governor Pitkin asked me to ask Mayor Sopris to at once appoint General Cook chief of police. I at once ran to the office of the mayor and found there a number of gentlemen smoking; asked if the mayor was in, and Alderman Austre, I think it was, pointed to a man sitting by a desk and introduced me to him as Mayor Sopris. Hurriedly I reported what was going on, told of my call upon the governor, and of his request to appoint General Cook, and of his being in his office ready to act officially when called upon. The mayor replied that he had quelled the riot in the afternoon all that he could, but had no force at his command to preserve the peace. I urged him to go in person to the heart of the mob and command it to disperse, and then if it persisted in disregard of law to call upon the State for the use of its militia. After a time he said he would go. He put on his overcoat and hat, took his cane, swore in as special police two men who had come into his office with myself. General Cook came in, and he at once appointed him chief of police and asked him to go with us.

Then we hastened out upon the sidewalk. General Cook ran for his pistols; with the help of W. J. Sprague we formed into line, two by two, quite a squad of citizens, who were willing to go with us to protect the mayor in the discharge of his duty. By this time General Cook, the new chief of police, came up and took the lead, Mayor Sopris and myself arm-in-arm following him with a number of brave men, forming a compact squad. As we marched down Sixteenth street from Lawrence I called on all who would to join us, and many, to their credit be it said, fell in line. We marched down the center of the street, and turned into the one where the mob was breaking in a row of houses, pushing ahead through the swaying mob till we neared the house. General Cook commanded the mob to disperse, and began firing in the air. The crowd broke and ran. The mayor then spoke, counseling regard to law and public decency. We stopped the demolition of property. When something like quiet was restored, the mayor returned to his office, and I ran to inform the governor that I believed the mob was broken, and that General Cook and the special police being sworn in, could preserve the city and hold the people to respect for law without his aid. Then I ran to the office of the mayor. Learning on the way that a mob was gathering near the Lawrence House to attack a Chinese laundry there, I ran to the mayor, and he came out again, went into the crowd, begged of those assembled to disperse. He was greeted by cheers, hoots, oaths, curses, &c., and stood there powerless, unable to be heard or respected. He offered to deliver the city over to the governor, and we hastened over to the governor's office, where, at five minutes before eight, Mayor Sopris formally asked Governor Pitkin to take the responsibility, to call out the troops, and protect the innocent from the guilty. Governor Pitkin at once telegraphed to the sheriff and to the headquarters of certain troops to be in readiness at once. I then hastened to my office and armed, returning to the governor's office for duty. He said all was in readiness, but that Sheriff Spangler thought that his increasing force of specials would be able to disperse the rioters; that if not, he was ready, and that the Governor's Guards and one or two batteries were ready to move. Governor Pitkin hoped the necessity could be averted, but was ready to issue orders if called upon by the sheriff. He asked me to get a horse and ride over the city, assisting the special police, and reporting to him of the condition of the streets.

I went to the stable of Philips & Son, procured a horse, and for two hours, with other special police, mounted or on foot, assisted all I could in the restoration of order, calling upon crowds to disperse, clearing saloons, &c. I found the Governor's Guards, under arms, in an alley, ready to move if called upon. I told crowds in the street that the militia was ordered out, and to hasten home to save bloodshed. Sometimes I was greeted with hoots and curses; at other times was thanked for the information. By eleven o'clock all was comparatively quiet. The specials having dispersed several riotous crowds, I helped to run Chinamen into places of safety, including the office of the mayor. I saw but one dead Chinaman on Lawrence street. I believe that the rioters dispersed when they realized in General Cook and the regulars and extra force under him, and in the governor, they had stern men to deal with. Had there been a prompt meeting of the mob with lead instead of streams of water at two o'clock in the afternoon, the riot would have died a-borning.

Chen Lan Pin to Mr. Evarts.

CHINESE LEGATION,
Washington, February 25, 1881. (Received February 25.)

SIR: I had the honor on the 21st ultimo to send your excellency a communication upon the subject of the riot at Denver, Colo., which resulted in the loss of life and the destruction of property owned by the Chinese residents.

I shall be greatly obliged, Mr. Secretary, if I may soon receive a reply thereto, that I may communicate the same to my government.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

CHEN LAN PIN.

No. 192.

Mr. Blaine to Chen Lan Pin.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 25, 1881.

SIR: Referring to your note of the 10th of November last, and my predecessor's reply thereto of the 30th of December following, on the subject of the riot on the 31st of last October, at Denver, Colo., I have now the honor to acknowledge the receipt by the Department, of your notes of the 21st of January and 25th of February, respectively, in relation to the same matter.

I note with satisfaction the expressions of appreciation of the disposition of this government toward that of China, and the subjects of China resident in the United States, which you so frankly avow. I must express my regret, however, that the views so clearly expressed by my predecessor in regard to the question of liability of this government to make pecuniary indemnity to the Chinese sufferers by the occurrences at Denver, failed to commend themselves to your enlightened judgment. Concurring, as I do, in the conclusions thus reached by Mr. Evarts, and conceiving the principle upon which they rest to be in consonance with public law and the universal practice of nations, I must insist that that principle is the one by which the obligations of this government in regard to the incident in question are to be measured. After recounting the efforts put forth by the local authorities for the suppression of the riots (efforts that happily proved successful with only the loss of one life, although the mob numbered thousands), my predecessor thus states the rule:

> Under circumstances of this nature, when the government has put forth every legitimate effort to suppress a mob that threatens or attacks alike the safety and security of its own citizens and the foreign residents within its borders, I know of no principle of national obligation, and there certainly is none arising from treaty stipulation, which renders it incumbent on the Government of the United States to make indemnity to the Chinese residents of Denver, who, in common with citizens of the United States at that time resident in that city, suffered losses from the operations of the mob. Whatever remedies may be afforded to the citizens of Colorado, or to the citizens of the United States from other States of the Union resident in Colorado, for losses resulting from that occurrance, are equally open to the Chinese residents of Denver who may have suffered from the lawlessness of that mob. This is all that the principles of international law and the usages of national comity demand.

You observe with reference to these views, "that it appears to you that treaties, as well as the Constitution, are the supreme law of this land." "The Chinese residents," you add, "who were subjected to the wanton outrage of the mob came to this country under the right of treaties between China and the General Government of the United States," and quoting from the verdict of the coroner's jury at the inquest over the body of the unfortunate Sing Lee, you proceed to say that "this verdict shows clearly that the local authorities had not brought into requisition all the means for the suppression of the mob." Invoking a support of these views the treaty of June, 1858, between the United States and China, you partially quote the provisions of the first article, the entire text of which is as follows:

> There shall be, as there have always been, peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Ta Tsing Empire, and between their people respectively. They shall not insult or oppress each other for any trifling cause, so as to produce an estrangement between them; and if any other nation should act unjustly or oppressively, the United States will exert their good offices on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement of the question, thus showing their friendly feelings.

In submitting for your consideration such remarks as these observations in your note seem to demand, I first bring to your notice the provisions of the first paragraphs of Article XI of the same treaty. It says:

> All citizens of the United States of America in China, peaceably attending to their affairs, being placed on a common footing of amity and good will with the subjects of China, shall receive and enjoy for themselves and everything appertaining to them, the protection of the local authorities of government, who shall defend them from all insult or injury of any sort. If their dwellings or property be threatened or attacked by mobs, incendiaries, or other violent or lawless persons, the local officers, on requisition of the consul, shall immediately dispatch a military force to disperse the rioters, apprehend the guilty individuals and punish them with the utmost rigor of the law.

You will perceive that neither in this article, nor in any other part of the same treaty is there any provision reciprocal with this with regard to subjects of China resident in the United States, and the reason for this must at once be obvious to your superior intelligence. No treaty stipulations are necessary to enable subjects of China to come to this country, take up their residence here and pursue any lawful business or calling in common with the citizens or subjects of every country in the world, who may choose to make their home in this republic. The subjects of China, in respect to their rights and security of person and property, are placed under the protection of the laws of the United States in manner and measure equal to that extended to native citizens of this country, and that the Chinese residents of Denver at the time of the unfortunate occurrences now in question, were in the enjoyment of this common protection of the law, is shown by the report of the Chinese consul, Mr. Bee, to you, a copy of which accompanies your note. One or two of the local functionaries may, at first, in the presence of an enraged mob numbering over 5,000, have shown some hesitation and timidity. Under the circumstances, it cannot be a matter of surprise that they were seized with such feelings, but as is seen by the report in question, the governor of the State, the mayor of the city, and the sheriff, acting in conjunction in the exercise of their respective powers, succeeded in quelling this formidable riot, which had its incipiency (in a drinking-house where Chinese and others were engaged in gambling on Sunday, contrary to the laws of the State) at two o'clock in the afternoon, within the short space of eight hours, quiet and order having been completely restored by ten o'clock of the same night. A more successful resistance to a mob of such character and numbers cannot be found in the history of any community or country, and that this should have been accomplished without the shedding of blood or a resort to the use of fire-arms is at once creditable to the authorities and to the popular respect for the laws.

And it is pertinent to add here that from Mr. Bee's report, it also appears that amongst a number of the ringleaders who have been arrested, two have been identified as the chief assailants of Sing Lee, and are now held for trial for the murder.

Your observations to the effect that treaties form a part of the supreme law of this land equally with the Constitution of the United States, is evidently based on a misconception of the true nature of the Constitution. That instrument, together with all laws which are made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, are the supreme law of the land. Such is the language of the Constitution, but it must be observed that the treaty no less than the statute law, must be made in conformity with the Constitution, and were a provision in either a treaty or a law found to contravene the principles of the Constitution, such provision must give way to the superior force of the Constitution, which is the organic law of the republic, binding alike on the government and the nation. It is under this interpretation of the Constitution that foreigners, no less than citizens, find their best guarantee for that security and protection in their persons and property which it is the aim and desire of the Government of the United States to extend to all alike.

Having thus replied to the several observations and suggestions submitted in your note, I venture to express the hope entertained by this government that the determination thus reached after mature consideration, will be accepted by that of China as the final conclusion of the subject.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my high consideration.

No. 226.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, November 6, 1880. (Received December 8.)

SIR: It will be interesting and gratifying to you to learn that in the various steps connected with the construction of a proposed interoceanic canal at Panama by a distinguished citizen of the French Republic, the course of the French Government has been marked by a strict adherence to the policy of non-interference in the matter.

I have learned that when Mr. L. N. B. Wyse, came to this capital in order to negotiate the contract for that enterprise with the Colombian Government, the representative of the French Republic received strict instructions on no account to commit his government to the support of the project.

Further, when Mr. de Lesseps, arrived at Panama, the French consul delivered an address of welcome containing some fanciful allusions to France and the interest manifested in his undertaking by the French Government. This action of the consul was disapproved and he was reprimanded.

Since then, in the instructions to the French legation the positive injunction has been renewed to abstain from giving any countenance to the canal scheme, and to make it understood that the French Government is in no way interested in the same.

As this information coincides with the statements made to you by the French minister at Washington, I have no doubt but that you will be pleased to hear of this exhibition of a frank and loyal spirit on the part of the Government of the French Republic.

No. 194.

Mr. Dichman to Mr. Evarts.

No. 228.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, November 12, 1880. (Received December 20.)

SIR: Ever since the provinces of the former unitary Republic of New Granada were changed by legal and revolutionary proceedings into sovereign states, resulting eventually in the federal union of the United States of Colombia, one of the gravest difficulties with which the government of the latter has had to deal has been an inordinate claim for state sovereignty advanced on the part of the constituent states of the Colombian Union, rendering the federal government practically incapable of providing for the interior harmony of the country and impotent for securing its exterior defenses.

Hitherto the Colombian Government has been powerless to protect the government of one of its states from internal violence, a resort to which having been the but too frequent method of bringing about a change in the administration of state governments, thereby preventing system in the administration leading to the defeat of the most salutary measures, and enervating both federal and state governments to such an extent as to produce a condition of anarchy and confusion.

The attention of Colombian statesmen has not been blinded to this evil, and measures have been proposed from time to time for its correction, all of which, however, have not been carried to a satisfactory conclusion, principally on account of having encountered too great a resistance on the part of the different state governments, which apprehended in the proposed measures a diminution of their own power.

With a view of removing one of the causes of the violent political agitations under which this country has suffered so frequently, by strengthening the hands of the general government, the Colombian Congress, at its last session, which has just been brought to a close, passed a law "upon public order," the model for which has been found in the 4th section of article IV of the Constitution of the United States, as you will learn from the inclosed copy and translation of the law, to which I beg leave to invite your attention.

In transmitting to you the above information concerning this important legal measure, it would afford me pleasure if I could also hold out the hope that in its application it will be productive of the beneficial results which in some quarters are confidently anticipated.

My knowledge of the history of the political development of this country, and of the character of its politicians, leads me to entertain the opinion, in which I hope I may prove to be mistaken, that the Colombian law above quoted will be used merely as an instrument for the selfish purposes and personal aggrandizement of the politicians who, for the time being, may wield the power of the federal government, by giving a pretext of legality to any interference on their part in the affairs of the government of a state which may suit their temporary convenience, and thus, instead of being conducive to greater stability and order in the administration of government, produce, by ill-directed attempts at its enforcement, the very outbreaks of domestic violence and revolutions which, by the enactment of the law "upon public order," it was the intention to restrain.

Irrespective of its constitutionality, which, according to the terms of the Colombian constitution, may at least be said to be doubtful, a question has already arisen as to its construction and enforcement.

One of the states of the Colombian Union having purchased a quantity of arms and ammunition for the use of its army, they were seized at the custom-house at Barranquilla, by order of the federal government, on the ground that the maintenance of an armed force by a state government was contrary to the spirit of the law "upon public order."

For the present the advantage in this question remains with the Colombian executive. But inasmuch as, according to the Colombian constitution, any law of Congress or any act of the Colombian executive which attacks the sovereignty of any one of the states may be declared null and void by a resolution of the legislatures of the majority thereof, and as the legislature of one state, which happens to be in session, has already so expressed itself, it will be found that however much the Colombian senators and representatives may have been in favor of the passage of the law, their respective state legislatures will obstruct its enforcement, and thus another one will be added to the long list of constitutional and legislative acts of this country which incumber the statute-books, but are not productive of any practical results whatever.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

LAW 19 OF 1880. (MAY 8.)

UPON PUBLIC ORDER.

The Congress of the United States of Colombia decrees:

SOLE ARTICLE. The national government secures to each of the states of the union a republican form of government, in the terms established in the federal constitution, and will restrain every attempt at invasion of any one of them, as well as all domestic violence against the government of whatever state, it being always understood that in the latter case the intervention of the national government be requested by the state legislature, or in the recess thereof by the state executive power.

Mr. Dichman to Mr. Evarts.

No. 232.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, December 5, 1880. (Received January 14, 1881.)

SIR: The Colombian minister at Washington has probably informed you before this of a circular note addressed by his government to the governments of the other Spanish-American republics, based upon article III of the projected treaty between Colombia and Chili, reported in my No. 205, of the 7th of September last, and having for its object a meeting of plenipotentiaries of all the Spanish-American states at Panama in September, 1881, for the purpose of executing with each other an international treaty or convention, similar to the one executed between Colombia and Chili, and thus not only establish the principle of international arbitration for the determination of any differences which may arise between any of the co-signatory states, as a part of the public law of this continent, but also provide for the practical application of this principle by constituting the President of the United States the permanent arbitrator under the proposed treaty.

On the same subject I am in receipt of a note from the Colombian secretary of foreign relations, inclosing a copy of the circular note above mentioned, and requesting me to solicit your good offices with governments of the several Spanish-American republics to the end that they may be induced to accept the invitation of the Colombian Government.

Although this action of the administration of President Nuñez in extending the invitation above mentioned may perhaps be premature, in view of the fact that the treaty between Colombia and Chili upon which it is based has not yet been approved and ratified, I nevertheless beg leave to recommend the solicitation expressed in the accompanying note of the Colombian secretary of foreign relations to your favorable consideration; for I am sure that the laudable object of providing for the more harmonious relations between the republican nations of this continent, and the increased moral influence of the Government of the United States is a matter in which you are deeply interested.

The inclosed correspondence does not disclose the fact that a plenipotentiary from the United States is invited to join in the execution of the proposed treaty or convention. This is probably owing to the reason that the position assigned to the Government of the United States by the proposed treaty is to maintain and exercise a friendly and judicial impartiality in the differences which may arise between the powers of Spanish America.

I would, however, respectfully recommend that if this proposed meeting of plenipotentiaries should take place, the Government of the United States be represented upon the occasion, in order to convey to that body the interest felt in the United States in its proceedings, and to manifest the willingness of the President of the United States to accept the trust which by the proposed treaty it is intended to confer upon him, if such should be his pleasure.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, NATIONAL EXECUTIVE POWER,
DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Cartagena, October 14, 1880.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to inclose to your honor the circular which, under date of the 11th instant, I have sent to the republican governments of Spanish America, inviting them to be represented before my government at Panama in the month of September, of the coming year, with the object that all of them may give adhesion to the convention celebrated between Colombia and Chili upon the subject of the preservation of international peace, which I also inclose to your honor.

As the reunion of all the representatives of the republics of this part of the world may, and doubtless will, give an occasion for establishing the principles of international law, which should rule in the future in their relations among each other and with the nations of Europe, and as your honor has demonstrated to me the convenience (apparent from every point of view) of the reunion of a congress for the indicated object, for the cause of democracy and the civilization of these peoples, I beg your honor to have the goodness to interest yourself with the Government of the United States, to the end that it may use its good relations with all the others of America, excepting that of Brazil, to induce them to send their representatives to Panama at the designated time.

The co-operation of the government of your honor will doubtless be of the greatest efficacy in furthering an object so important for all America.

With sentiments of most distinguished consideration, I subscribe myself your honor's attentive and obedient servant,

EUSTACIO SANTAMARIA.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 232.—Translation.]

Circular note of Colombia Government.

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Carthagena, October 11, 1880.

MR. MINISTER: Adjoined your excellency will find an authentic copy of the convention celebrated in Bogotà on the 3d of last September, between the Governments of Colombia and Chili, by virtue of which the two republics bind themselves to settle in perpetuity whatever differences or controversies may arise between them by means of the civilized and humane method of arbitration, and to obtain by treaty from other sister peoples the celebration of similar mutual conventions, with the object of forever banishing international wars from the American continent.

My government, initiator of this measure, considers it of such importance that it has not wished to lose a single moment in making it known to all the other governments of America, in order that they may, as soon as possible, give adhesion to this idea and adopt as an integral and essential part of American international law the principle incorporated in the said convention.

Peace is an especial necessity for Spanish America, and there is a visible anxiety to secure this inestimable boon, and to preserve it from one extremity to the other of our continent. In effect great efforts are being made everywhere to disseminate public instruction among the masses, and to foment commerce and industry, while at the same time the inveterate elements of discord are being energetically attacked. Order will thus establish itself upon solid bases, as the knowledge and practice of republican institutions extend themselves, all of which will be accomplished when intestine wars shall become rarities.

But international dissensions may supervene, especially those arising from questions of boundaries and a strained punctiliousness.

Nations like ours, owners of immense territories, ought not to ruin or dishonor themselves by bloody and disastrous wars on account of portions of uninhabited, and in many cases uninhabitable, regions, which, for the sake of the civilization and humanity of America, might as well belong to one nationality as to another.

Wars of this class are those to be averted, and this will doubtless be accomplished, if all the nations of the continent adhere to the saving principle included in the transcendant compact celebrated between Colombia and Chili.

The President of the republic desiring to assist all sister governments in the adoption of so humane a measure, has resolved to return to Panama in the early part of September of the coming year, and he has ordered me to request your excellency to cause to be appointed a representative of your republic to proceed to said city with sufficient powers to sign the referred-to convention, not only with my government, but with those of the other American republics that may send representatives.

The city of Panama being in easy communication with the capitals of all the American republics, and as it were the center of this continent, is the most appropriate point to reunite the representatives of them all, and it is for this reason that by order of the executive power I extend to the government of your excellency this invitation, which I hope will not be disregarded, as its object is of such importance to America.

With the well established hope to receive at Bogotá a speedy and satisfactory reply from your excellency, I take the advantage of this opportunity to present to your excellency the sentiments of the highest and most distinguished consideration with which I subscribe myself,

Your excellency's very attentive and obedient servant,

EUSTACIO SANTAMARIA.

His excellency the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

No. 235.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, December 20, 1880. (Received February 21, 1881.)

SIR: The return of President Nuñez from the coast was officially notified to his fellow-citizens by means of a proclamation, a copy and translation of which you will please to find inclosed.

In this proclamation President Nuñez recites the benefits which have been secured for Colombia by him during his absence from the national capital. The settlement of the dispute with Costa Rica, the calling of a meeting of Spanish-American plenipotentiaries at Panama, the obtaining of a loan in the United States and the maintenance of peace are the facts, with an account of which the first half of the document is occupied, while the latter half is devoted to an outline of the future policy of his administration, dwelling with much emphasis upon the necessity for the utmost economy in the expenditure of the public funds. * * *

From the measures which have already been taken in the last four days, it would seem as though the promises of President Nuñez were intended to be complied with. * * * Decrees have already been issued to reduce the army from 5,000 to 3,500 men (it could stand a greater reduction); to declare vacant all paid diplomatic and consular appointments on the first of July next; * * * to provide for the reduction in the cash payment of all salaries and pensions to a minimum, the balance to be paid in depreciated treasury scrip; and to establish a national bank with a capital of $1,000,000, which is to commence operations on the 1st of January next. What part this bank is to perform in the regeneration of the country is as yet shrouded in mystery, for as a question of financial policy the establishment of a national bank is perhaps a mistake.

It is gratifying to be able to report to you, however, that with the return of President Nuñez public confidence has been measurably restored, that the country is at peace, and that the only threatening element for the future is in the selection of the candidate for the next presidential term. Perhaps President Nuñez would like to be his own successor, but as that is prohibited by the Colombian constitution the influence of the national bank may be fully developed when the reform of that instrument comes up for discussion during the next session of the Colombian Congress.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

PROCLAMATION.

After an absence of three months, which had for its principal object the prompt recovery of a part of the national territory occupied de facto about the middle of last year by authority of the Government of Costa Rica, I find myself again in the capital of the Union, and the executive power, with the direction of which I am charged, resumes its functions, therefore, as in regular and ordinary circumstances.

The Government of Costa Rica in a spirit of fraternity and of justice, certainly very worthy of praise and even of gratitude upon our part, hastened to repair the momentary offense as soon as it was able to comprehend that thus we considered the indiscreet act of its subordinate agents. The temporary and confidential mission, so ably acquitted of its obligation, that was charged with demanding the evacuation of our territory, has been finally replaced by one which should effect, by means of diplomatic discussion, a definite arrangement as to the ordinary question of boundaries, which will be eventually submitted to arbitration in accordance with the resolve of the senate of Colombia in its last session.

Having promoted the celebration of a diplomatic conference for adoption by the natives of Spanish America, of this principle of arbitration for whatever controversy that may arise between them in fulfillment of what is stipulated in a plan of convention between Colombia and Chili, the constitutional sanction of which I expect, anticipating it by putting it into practice with a country inferior in population and wealth to Colombia, will be an eloquent proof of our cordial adhesion to this humanitarian mode of formally resolving difficulties which are the cause of countless misfortunes, when in order to decide them appeal is had to arms.

The warlike preparation which the not-to-be-disregarded care of the exterior security of the republic obliged us to make, having no object now, the army has consequently been ordered reduced to a limit that at this time seems indispensable for the strict maintenance of internal peace, without which all constitutional liberty is endangered, and no improvement, however modest, is practicable.

My accidental residence in the states of the Atlantic afforded me the occasion for intervening with prompt and happy results in the demand for the execution of the revenues of the railroad de facto and unadvisedly initiated by our old foreign creditors when there was being negotiated in New York a loan, as an auxiliary urgently necessary for the improvement of our credit and of our finances in general, whose notorious and progressive prostration, the fruit of errors which we should only recall as a lesson, is already seriously threatening the entire mechanism of the public service, and compromising also, in this manner, the preservation of order which cannot be compatible with the paralysis, however partial, of administrative labor.

The loan was finally negotiated, notwithstanding the obstacle presented by said creditors, and the unfavorable coincidence that the commencement of work upon the interoceanic canal was considered near at hand, which would leave without effective value the clause of the contract with the Panama Railroad Company concerning its prolongation. After six years of repeated fruitless exertions the republic has succeeded in acquiring this extraordinary resource, which will relieve without doubt our financial condition, but in order to amply justify this costly draft upon the future it is indispensable that we carefully apply its product to operations of a reproductive character; and such is the firm purpose of the government, since for ordinary expenditure it would not under any circumstances have endeavored to obtain it.

There have been at the same time opportunely and effectively examined other matters of public interest in the coast, which, although of secondary importance, it was desirable to arrange in time, and with direct knowledge of their respective details. Peace has been preserved with the same stability in the midst of the numerous population of the interior of the republic as in other parts of the country, and this pleasing fact has been a great objective demonstration that there is already established in the Colombian sentiment an odium for armed resolutions, which, except in very rare cases, ever bring upon the people evils much greater than those they seek to remedy, if they do not involve them in awful ruin, without compensation of any kind.

I now propose to continue the task undertaken to strengthen the spirit of harmony by sustaining the practice of toleration, by the exact fulfillment of constitutional and legal duties, and especially by an impartiality, in which there shall not be the shadow of deception, respecting the exercise of the right of suffrage. To Congress it will be demonstrated that there is vital importance in making considerable reduction in the estimate of expenses, in order to avoid social disaster, which can scarcely be partially regulated by the employment of combinations of credit and other accessory means. Whilst Congress reconvenes and deliberates in the spirit indicated, as I promise it shall, in view of what has occurred, the government will proceed with the greatest moderation in the matter of expenses, deferring all that is of minor importance; since it is not only convinced of the necessity, more than commanding, of substantial economy, but that this is one of the clearest demands of the national opinion, justly alarmed at this time by the penury of the treasury.

This work of common salvation I could not have realized in that part of my term already passed, nor can I succeed in effecting it during that which remains without the co-operation of the country whose affairs it is my duty to administer, in accordance with the solemn promise I gave before God and Congress when I took possession of the Presidency of Colombia. Long ago I expressed the conviction, not only of the inconvenience but of the impossibility of governments of monopoly, and to-day more than ever I find motives to preserve this conviction. The logic of interest, which so greatly dwarfs politics, is as inexorable as any other logic, and in the rigid domination of military prejudices it fatally exalts itself above the apparent causes of the decomposition of great parties. When these are again divided by the true necessities of principles, instead of diminishing, they increase each day the groups that these principles proclaim with the continued accession of strength, which might have until then appeared antagonistic. It is very evident that important and inevitable influences may oblige one who governs to abandon the most mighty and best considered of his purposes; but, so far as I am concerned, I can assure the nation that according as circumstances clearly determine or permit the direct departures from the fundamental rule that are possible shall be corrected, since the first aspiration of a government that thoroughly comprehends its entire responsibility should be the desire to secure the greatest sum of public confidence by means of acts which are in reality capable of inspiring it.

Bogotá, December 27, 1880. (Received February 21, 1881.)

SIR: Upon the conclusion of an exhibition drill by the cadets of the Colombian military school, held at the close of the exercises connected with the first annual examination of that institution, in the presence of the President of this Republic, the members of his cabinet, the diplomatic corps, and an immense concourse of spectators, President Nuñez requested me to inform you of the great satisfaction experienced by him at the result of the labors of First Lieut. Henry R. Lemly, Third Regiment of United States Artillery, by whom the school of civil and military engineering has been organized.

It will no doubt be of interest to the War Department to learn of the satisfactory manner in which Mr. Lemly has acquitted himself in the discharge of the duties of his position, and the credit his conduct reflects upon the branch of the public service to which he belongs.

At my request, Mr. Lemly prepared a brief report upon the condition and organization of the Colombian army and military school, a copy of which I beg leave to inclose and to which your attention is respectfully invited.

REPORT UPON THE ARMY AND NATIONAL MILITARY SCHOOL OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA.

BOGOTÁ, November 28, 1880.

SIR: In obedience to your verbal request, I have the honor to submit the following report upon the organization, equipment, &c., and the recent operations of the army of the United States of Colombia, and of the lately established national military school, in which, by the courtesy of our own government, I hold the position of commandant of cadets, professor of military engineering and the science of war, and instructor of tactics.

The Army of the United States of Colombia comprises, in round numbers, 5,000 men, of whom 1,000 constitute the regular garrison of Bogotá and 500 that of Panama. At present there are 1,500 men at the latter station, the increase being ostensibly due to boundary complications with Costa Rica. This fact, and perhaps a combination of political causes, have effected, during the existing administration, an addition of 2,000 or 3,000 to the ordinary strength. The 2,500 men unaccounted for above are distributed among the principal cities of the nine States which comprise the Republic.

The army is divided primarily into the general staff (estado mayor-general) and the line. The personnel of the former is as follows:

The commander or general-in-chief (ex-president Julian Trujillo).

The chief-of-staff, who is a brigadier-general.

Three first adjutant-generals (primeros ayudantes generales), who are brigadier-generals.

Four adjutant-generals, who are colonels.

Nine second adjutant-generals (segundos ayudantes generales), four of whom are lieutenant-colonels and five majors.

Ten assistants (adjuntos), who are captains and (or) lieutenants.

Two orderlies (cornetas de ordenes.)

One inspector-general.

The line comprises four divisions of two columns each, and consists of sixteen battalions of infantry and one of artillery, with which are associated one battalion of sharpshooters (tiradores) and one of sappers (zapadores.)

Each division (properly brigade) is commanded by a brigadier-general, who, with the officers of his staff, forms the cuartel general, as follows:

The brigadier-general, commanding the division.

The chief of staff, who is also a brigadier-general.

Three assistants, who are colonels and (or) lieutenant-colonels.

Three assistants, who are captains and (or) lieutenants.

One orderly (corneta de ordenes).

Each battalion contains about 250 men, and is commanded by a colonel or lieutenant-colonel, with a major second in command, and a captain as adjutant, and comprises five companies (or batteries), in each of which are the following officers and non-commissioned officers:

One captain, commanding,
One lieutenant,
Two sublieutenants,
One first sergeant,
Three second sergeants,
Five first corporals,
Five second corporals, and
Two musicians, one with drum, the other with bugle.

To each battery of artillery are assigned two Whitworth guns of two or three inches in diameter, which, unprovided with caissons or limbers, are drawn by the men themselves; the ammunition consisting of solid shot and shell, being transported in chests, one to each piece, slung to the carriages. There are also three Gatling guns on carriages and two on tripods, all firing the Remington rifle cartridge, which are distributed one to each battery of artillery, and some brass pieces of varying caliber, most of which were captured from the Spaniards in the war of independence.

The army is furnished with the Remington rifle and sword bayonet (Spanish model), but not with pistols. The officers carry swords only. What few munitions of war are required are transported upon the backs of beasts, or even of men and women; and tents and similar camp equipage are usually dispensed with. As for subsistence stores in barracks or upon the march, every officer and soldier provides for himself, an easy matter in this country of luxuriant and indigenous fruits and vegetables.

The topography is ill-suited to the operations of mounted troops, and there is no cavalry in the army. During the revolution of 1876 the government armed with the lance and Winchester carbine about 500, but they were disbanded after the war. There is, however, a very fine and spirited breed of horses of Andalusian extraction, upon the elevated plateau whereon Bogotá is situated, that deserves especial mention. They are natural pacers or rackers; and although rarely or never groomed, indifferently stabled, and fed exclusively upon the green grass of the Sabana, are distinguished alike for their beauty, docility, and endurance.

To each battalion is assigned one surgeon, with the assimilated rank of major; and both in Bogotá and Barranquilla there is a military hospital, under the immediate charge of one chief and two assistant surgeons each, and the care of the Sisters of Charity, to whom, in return for which attention, the government furnishes a partial support.

Of military bands there are three, each with a drum-major and from 16 to 20 musicians, the former ranking with a first sergeant and the latter with corporals. Two bands are permanently stationed in Bogotá and the third accompanies the general-in-chief.

The pay of the army is as follows:

General-in-chief	per month	$400 00
General	do.	200 00
Colonel	do.	140 00
Lieutenant-Colonel	do.	100 00
Major	do.	80 00
Captain	do.	55 00
Lieutenant	do.	40 00
Sublieutenant	do.	30 00
First sergeant	per day	0 60
Second sergeant	do.	55
First corporal	do.	50
Second corporal	do.	47½
Soldier	do.	40

In addition each soldier receives per month one pair alpargatas (a sort of shoe or sandal made of native hemp), soap with which to wash his clothes, two uniforms per year, and one blanket. They are comfortably quartered in barracks, one or two of which in Bogota are lighted with gas. The inferior commissioned officers reside in the same cuarteles with the men, but occupy distinct rooms.

The above comprehends the entire pay of the army, and as before remarked each officer and soldier has to provide his own sustenance.

Many of the officers have homes or perhaps form messes for this purpose; but while the latter means may be resorted to by a few of the soldiers, as a general thing each one has his wife or woman (distinctly called zuanas here), who, at intervals, enters the barracks with his food, which usually consists of a nutritious but cheap soup, called masamora (the pot-an-fen of the French), served in a botuma (gourd) with a wooden spoon. On the march and upon the campaign these women accompany the troops, are excellent foragers, and have been known to fight with great pertinacity in battle. Of course the soldiers are all Indians, chiefly from the States of Boyacá, Cundinamarca, and Santander. They are recruited almost as cattle are lassoed, never resist, and rarely desert. Small in stature, they have strong and well-knit frames; and although not fond of work, endure fatigue without a murmur. They are quiet in demeanor and susceptible of much discipline. Mutinies and the graver military offenses are of rare occurrence; for those of minor degree, flogging and other corporal punishment s aread-ministered. If ordered to shoot a comrade in ranks, they obey unhesitatingly; and well led, they are capable of the greatest bravery and tenacity. If surrendered or taken captives, however, they fight equally well for their captors until the chances of war, perhaps, bring them again under their old standard. The advocates of machine soldiers, would, in short, find in them fit subjects.

As the subsistence of the army is accomplished without a commissary department, neither is there a quartermaster nor a pay department. The officers of the general or special staffs may be assigned to duty in a capacity analogous to that of quartermasters, engineers, ordnance officers, or judge advocates, although their system of military jurisprudence is neither complicated nor extensive; and the payment of the troops is effected in the following manner: In each cuartel general and battalion respectively, there is annually designated by the officers thereof, a lieutenant or sublieutenant as treasurer, who receives from the national treasury in advance, five times per month or every sixth day, the sum total of their salaries and the pay of the men for such period. This is transferred to the officers at such times, and the pay of each company to its captain, who daily distributes the same to the men. The latter precaution wisely insures their subsistence, and is not only an obstacle to desertion, but to gambling and chicha (a native, undistilled, but intoxicating liquor) drinking, to which vices the Indians are greatly addicted. In a residence of four months in Bogota I have not seen a drunken soldier, and must confess that in this respect our bi-monthly (at times, semi-annual) payments with their attendant desertions and general ebriety, suffer greatly by comparison.

There are no factories of any description connected with the army, but uniforms and equipments, arms and munitions of war, &c., are purchased by contract or in open market. The former are of French manufacture, and comprise jackets or dolmans of dark blue cloth, trimmed with red frogs and cord; the trousers of the artillery of the same color as the coat, with two wide stripes of red, and those of the infantry of the latter color entire. The dress hat is similar to that of our own artillery, and upon parade officers and men alike wear epaulets, the former golden, the latter of yellow wool. Their fatigue cap is the French chasseur.

They execute with no little military precision the manœuvres of the Spanish tactics adopted twenty years ago by General Mosquera; and especially in the manual of arms, by drum-signals, show great aptitude.

There is no retired list. Every officer retains his commission, and is subject to military service when called upon by the government; but, except when actively engaged, he receives no salary. As a consequence of their small pay, they often continue, when practicable, other occupations with the exercise of their legitimate profession.

The families of those killed, or who die of wounds received in battle, are entitled to a small annual pension, and Congress occasionally grants an annuity for life to veterans who have especially distinguished themselves by gallantry or length of service. For the aged soldier there is no provision.

During the civil wars, which have almost yearly ravaged certain sections of the country, guerrillas have abounded in all parts, and practiced with no little success their peculiar mode of warfare. The most recent revolution of any consequence was that of 1876, and it may not be uninteresting to briefly notice a few of the principal battles thereof.

Twenty thousand troops, more or less, were actively engaged upon each side, and the struggle lasted about one year. A political party, the conservadores (conservatives), formed the revolutionary element, and were defeated by the government troops in almost every instance.

In the first engagement of any note, that of Altogrande, in the State of Santander, General Bernal commanded for the government, and the following figures obtained: Government forces, 400; revolutionary forces, 1,200. Very few were armed, and the opposing sides closing, fought with their fists.

The first battle was that of Chancas, in the State of Cauca, in which General Trujillo commanded for the government. Government forces, 3,500; revolutionary forces, 6,000; killed and wounded, 1,000.

Battle of Garrapata, in the State of Tolima, General Acasta commanding for the government: Government forces, 4,500; revolutionary forces, 6,000; killed and wounded, 3,000. Trenches and rifle-pits were employed, notwithstanding the opponents approached and fought within seventy-five yards of each other.

Battle of Dan Juana in the State of Santander, General Camargo (now ex-minister to England and Radical candidate for the Presidency) commanding for the government: Government forces, 3,000; revolutionary forces, 4,000; killed and wounded 800.

In the skirmish of Ramiriqui, a force of 15 government troops are said to have captured 150 insurgents, losing one man killed.

The last battle of the war was that of Manizales, in the State of Antioquia, General Trujillo commanding for the government: Government forces, 6,000; revolutionary forces, 10,000; killed and wounded, 500. The town of Manizales is almost impregnably situated upon a mountain, only one side of which is accessible. The insurgents occupied and fortified the town; but in the course of several months, during which General Trujillo successfully employed regular approaches and other military engineering expedients, and displayed great humanity, patience, and tenacity of purpose, the besieged were slowly driven from one bastion to another, and the town, its remaining defenders, their arms and munitions of war, captured.

Few, if any, of the officers of the army have received a professional military education; and apparently realizing the necessity therefor, Congress, by act 69, of 1877, authorized and directed the establishment of a national "School of civil and military engineering" in the city of Bogota, in pursuance of which, the executive power (President Trujillo) on the 26th of November, 1879, decreed the organization and opening of said school upon the 2d of February, 1880. It was intended to secure two French officers to fill professorships in the military department, but through your instrumentality, it was determined to apply for American officers instead, and Mr. Thomas B. Nichols, of Pittsburgh, Pa., a graduate of the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., class of 1872, and recently second lieutenant of the Sixth Regiment of United States Cavalry, and I contracted with an agent of the Colombian Government in the city of New York for this purpose. Owing to our non-arrival, the school was not opened in February, as was expected, but in August of this year, a second decree by the executive power (President Nuñez), No. 632, of 1880, dated July 30, supplementing the first. By it, a five years' course of study, very similar to that pursued at the United States Military Academy, was established, and by decree No. 633, of the same date, a director, inspector, professors, surgeon, and other officers of the institution were named, since which the school has been in successful operations.

The scholastic year begins in February, for admission at which time there are more than two hundred applications. Thirty cadets, apportioned among the nine States of the republic, have also been officially appointed by the government. These receive $120 each per annum.

There are both internos and esternos, that is, cadets who live in and out of the school; but all are required to attend daily, and to submit to military discipline. The tuition is free, and board for the ensuing year has been contracted for at $8 per month. A uniform of dark blue cloth, with white gloves and belts, has been adopted, and the cadets armed with Remington rifles. The systems of reports, &c., and of punishments, &c., are similar to those in use at West Point. Annual examinations will also be held in the months of November and December, and the remaining days of the latter month and all of January will be passed by the cadets in camp and upon marches, during which time they will receive exclusively practical military instruction. At present the old convent La Candalaria is occupied by the school, but in the new year it will remove to the building known as El Seminario, now undergoing repairs for the purpose.

I omitted to state that cadets are required to be between the ages of fourteen and twenty, and to pass a preliminary physical, as well as examination in reading, writing, and other elementary branches. Those officially appointed pledge themselves to serve, when called upon, in the army.

There is, of course, little to say for the school in its present incipient state, but its future is full of promise. The reception and support given Mr. Nichols and myself have been in every respect gratifying.

By direction of the secretary of war, the tactics used by the Army of the United States have been adopted, and the cadets are twice daily drilled therein. Of their military instruction I have exclusive charge, while Mr. Nichols has several classes of officers of the army, whom he is instructing in the duties of the staff, and especially at this time in signaling.

In this connection I cannot refrain from requesting and urging you to recommend to our government the propriety of inviting the Government of Colombia to send at least two or three of the cadets who most distinguish themselves in this school, to each of our national academies (West Point and the Naval Academy of Annapolis). Such national courtesy would seem to involve no expense whatever; and while it does not appear to be of any national consequence, you cannot have failed to observe that every South American who visits the United States establishes, or induces others to establish, business connections with our citizens. However insignificant, this will, at least, be a step in the preservation of our friendly, and the extension of our commercial, relations with a country inherently so rich that with the progress of years the introduction of railways and other means of rapid communication and traffic, and possibly the construction of an isthmus canal, it must become of vastly increased commercial importance. The United States is the natural exporter to South America; yet England, France, and Germany divide half, if not the greater part of the trade (our own has greatly augmented during the last few years, especially with Colombia), and even that which remains to American merchants is largely or entirely transported in English steamships.

Begging your indulgence for this brief digression, and your favorable consideration and recommendation of the proposal which induced it,

I have, &c.,

H. R. LEMLY,
First Lieutenant Third United States Artillery.

No. 238.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, December 29, 1880. (Received February 21, 1881.)

SIR: It is not without a sincere feeling of sorrow on my part that I bring to your notice the death, which took place on Sunday, the 26th instant, of Dr. Manuel Murillo, who for many years has occupied a prominent position in the politics of this country. In him I not only mourn the loss of a personal friend, but also regret the disappearance from this political stage of a statesman who was always ready to put into practice the admiration felt by him for the United States and its political institutions. To his wise counsels, springing from a ripe judgment, and his active co-operation, made invaluable from the exceptional political position which he occupied, I shall always feel deeply indebted for facilitating the discharge of my duties at this legation. He will, no doubt, be pleasantly remembered by Mr. Hunter, about whom he made frequent inquiries of me, having been the Colombian minister at Washington from 1862 to 1864. The courtesy extended to him by Mr. Seward by placing a man-of-war at his service to bring him back to his country, where, during his absence in the United States, he had been elected to the position of President of this republic, has always been remembered by him and his many friends as a pleasing and gratifying mark of personal consideration and of international attention.

His funeral, which took place yesterday, was attended by the entire official society at this capital, in addition to which a multitude, estimated at over 10,000 people, who, in the midst of a pouring rain, accompanied his remains to their final resting place, testified by their manifestations of sorrow the firm hold which the departed statesman had enjoyed upon the sympathies of his fellow-citizens.

Although for some time past, owing to the precarious state of his health, he had withdrawn from the active participation in politics, his death will leave a void in the counsels of this nation not easy to be filled. Next to Santander he was the father of the liberal party in Colombia, and the author of many political measures for the purpose of bringing the practices of the government of this country in accord with the civilization of the present day.

While the meed of perfection cannot be claimed for him any more than for any other member of the human family, and while in the political reforms which he advocated with varying success perhaps too little account was taken of popular prejudice, thereby sometimes endangering the stability of political institutions and reducing measures conceived to be for the public good to the dangerous level of mere political experiment, it will redound to his lasting fame in the history of Colombia that he was always a courageous and able champion for the rights of the people, constantly struggling for their education, elevation, and advancement.

With a firm faith in the efficacy of republican institutions to dissipate the mists of ignorance and superstition by which the social and political atmosphere of this country has been obscured, he bore the changing fortunes of a political career extending over forty years, during which he was twice elected to the position of President, with a philosophic equanimity born of the sincerity and strength of his convictions, and, as with the receding years the salient features of his character stand out in bolder relief, it is safe to predict that among the names of the many statesmen which are recorded in the annals of Colombia none will occupy a more conspicuous position and be entitled to more honor than the one of the late Dr. Manuel Murillo.

SIR: Upon the receipt of your No. 133, of the 13th of October last, referring to the treaty for the preservation of peace between the Republics of Colombia and Chili, I took the first favorable opportunity for bringing the sentiments contained in your dispatch just cited to the knowledge of the Colombian Government, upon which the most gratifying impression was produced, to the extent of eliciting the suggestion on the part of the Colombian foreign secretary that I might find it convenient to embody your views in an official communication in order that the Colombian Congress, at its next session, might be made acquainted therewith.

Accordingly, I addressed a note to the Colombian foreign secretary, a copy of which I beg leave to inclose, in which I endeavored to convey to his government a knowledge of the pertinent parts of your dispatch No. 133, above mentioned.

From the accompanying copy of his answer you will be pleased to learn that your sentiments, of which I was happy to be the simple instrument of transmission, were received by the President of this republic with the most profound satisfaction, and that the ready approval extended to this government in its adhesion to the great principle of international arbitration and the acceptance for the President of the United States of the office of arbitrator, the interests of peace between the Spanish-American Republics have been advanced, and the friendly and honorable position of the United States as their mediator and counselor is fully recognized.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, January 7, 1881.

SIR: The negotiation of the treaty for the preservation of peace between the Republics of Colombia and Chili, concluded between the chargé d'affaires of the latter country and yourself, having been reported by me to my government, it affords me much pleasure to inform you that the intelligence thus conveyed by me has been received with feelings of lively satisfaction at Washington, as indicating on the part of the Government of Colombia, not merely a desire to maintain and strengthen the relations of peace and good will with the Government of Chili, but as evincing also a concurrence with the great principle of arbitration in the settlement of international disputes, by establishing in the treaty above mentioned that system of appeal as between cosignatory states in all future emergencies; and the designation, made in the same instrument, of the President of the United States as arbitrator between them in certain contingencies has been accepted as a manifestation of that confidence in the impartial amity of the Government of the United States for the sister republics of the American continent, which it has always been its proud privilege to welcome on every fitting occasion and strengthen by its example of good will and kindly interest in their welfare.

In advance of the completion of the treaty by the exchange of the ratifications for which provision is made in the fourth article, or in anticipation of any formal invitation by Colombia, I am pleased to be able to convey to you the informal assurance that should occasion for arbitration between the two countries which are parties to the treaty arise, the President of the United States will deem himself privileged in being able to respond to the flattering trust reposed in him and as evincing the interests of the people and Government of the United States in all that concerns the welfare of Colombia.

Before bringing this communication to a close it may also be of interest for you to learn that, on the subject of the treaty between Colombia and Chili, an instruction, of similar tenor to the one which has given rise to this communication, has been sent by the honorable Secretary of State at Washington to the minister of the United States at Santiago, who, I have no doubt, will convey to the government of Chili the like sentiments of amity and high appreciation which it has been my pleasant duty to express to you upon the occasion.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

Señor Santamaria to Mr. Dichman.

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogotá, January 14, 1881.

SIR: Your courteous note of the 7th instant was placed by me in the hands of the President of the republic, and I have the honor to inform you that its contents produced in him the most profound satisfaction, although not really a surprise, since when he dictated the stipulation contained in article 2 of the convention of peace between Colombia and Chili he did not doubt for a moment that the President of the United States would accept with good will the part of arbitrator between the two republics which is therein attributed to him, and that this fact would afford the government at Washington the opportunity of again manifesting and of putting into practice, occurring the contingency, those sentiments of impartial friendship it has ever shown in favor of its sister republics of the American continent, and more especially of Colombia, to which it has been bound during many years by the closest and most cordial ties through their community of interests of great importance and identity of aspirations and institutions.

The adherence of my government to the grand principle of arbitration as the only available mode of amicably adjusting whatever international disagreement or nonconformity, has been constant and firm since the political emancipation of this country, and whenever it has been admissible it has yielded to it in public treaties, especially with sister republics. But the adherence of my government to such principles and its submission to it in said treaties would be worthless if at the proper time it were not provided, nothing improbable, in the event that the contracting parties could not or would not agree respecting the selection of an arbitrator, in which case the application of the great principle would become useless and there would remain no other recourse than an appeal to arms or the most abject humiliation of the contracting parties. It was to avoid this grave occurrence that the head of my government caused to be introduced into said convention the very excellent stipulation that in the event of disagreement in the selection of an arbitrator, it would be obligatory upon the contracting parties to submit to the decision of the President of the United States.

As you must know the convention alluded to was very well received by the Government of Chili on which account it may be expected that it will be approved during the year by the Congress of each republic. So that relying as we may with security upon the gracious acceptance by the President of the United States of the charge of arbitrator that by virtue of said stipulation appertains to him it may be safely predicted without risk of equivocation that the doors are forever closed to a war between Colombia and Chili.

But you are aware that although it is a cause for satisfaction for Colombia that she succeeds in obtaining the assurance of living perpetually in peace with Chili she will have effected very little for her future tranquillity without the absolute certainty of living in like manner with her other sister republics with some of which she possesses clashing interests by reason of boundaries, proximity, and other circumstances. It is precisely with Chili that this country least fears difficulties. The great distance that separates their territories, the proper pride that Colombia has ever experienced at the sight of the prosperity of this sister republic, the admiration with which she has contemplated the solid peace she has enjoyed and the great and sincere sympathy which has been won from this country by the thinking people of Chili in their stoic struggle constant and audacious in favor of those liberal principles based upon justice and toleration are circumstances which would make even without the convention alluded to if not impossible at least most remote, any cause for difficulty between the two countries.

The President regarded the matter in this light and anxiously the idea of a convention of peace between Colombia and Chili when the chargé d'affaires of the latter proposed it with the object of introducing in it the clause alluded to and that which is contained in article 3. These two points comprise what there is truly grand, practically, substantially, purely American, and especially new in that document.

The said convention accepted in these terms by the American republics as may be expected that it will be in the course of the year at Panama, there will be a perpetual international peace upon the American continent and the United States will assume the great office, as of right pertains to it, of mediator and counselor among the sister republics of the New World, bearing upon her banner high and secure the celebrated motto of one of her Presidents: "America for the Americans."

In the name of my government I have the honor to thank you for your spontaneous solicitude in laying the subject to which this note refers before that at Washington and to beg that you will deign to accept the sentiments of high consideration and respect with which I subscribe myself,

Your very obedient servant,

EUSTACIO SANTAMARIA.

No. 248.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, February 4, 1881. (Received March 23.)

SIR: The 1st day of February of each year being the time fixed by the Colombian constitution for the meeting of Congress that body met on the day just stated.

Although this is an adjourned session from last year the members of this Congress having been elected at the same time and for the same period of two years as the present administration, it can already be noted that the opposition party in Congress which can hardly be said to have had an existence during the last session has increased its members to such an extent as will tax the resources and ingenuity of the administration to the utmost to prevent it from acquiring a majority.

Deferring a general examination of the President's message (one copy of which has been forwarded separately, and another is inclosed) to a future occasion, I beg leave to invite your attention at present to that part thereof which treats of the relations between the United States and Colombia, as connected with the concession granted for the excavation of an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

[Inclosure in No. 248.—Translation.]

Extract from the President's message to the Colombian Congress.

With the United States of America we continue in relations of the most friendly harmony, the slight misunderstandings arising from the concession granted for the opening of the interoceanic canal having received a mutual and frank explanation.

As this canal is to be cut through a territory, the neutrality and sovereignty of which have been guaranteed by the government of that republic, which in that sense considers itself our ally, it is not impossible that new controversies may arise which may make discussions between the two governments upon this matter necessary, but judging from the spirit of justice and kindness which distinguishes the acts of the Cabinet of Washington, and of which its representative at this capital has made himself more than once the authorized interpreter, I am confident that the conclusions of such discussions will always be pacific and satisfactory in every respect.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions contained in your No. 149 of the 20th of last January, relating to the protection afforded to Colombian citizens in Peru by the minister of the United States at Lima, I addressed a note to the Colombian secretary of foreign relations embodying the statements contained in your dispatch, and I am now in receipt of an answer from that gentleman in which he makes due acknowledgment of the friendly services of Mr. Christiancy, as well as expressing a proper appreciation of the approval extended to his action by the Department.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, March 18, 1881.

SIR: Under date of January 21, 1881, the honorable Secretary of State of the United States communicates the following information to this legation:

"In his dispatch No. 218 of the 3d ultimo, the minister of the United States at Lima, Mr. Christiancy, reports the extension by his legation of protection to the citizens of the United States of Colombia and their interests during the present war now going on in Peru. In view of their having no diplomatic representative in that country, the vice-consul of Colombia applied to him for such protection, and the Peruvian Government having recognized him as acting in their behalf, he will render them all possible assistance. Mr. Christiancy's action in the premises has been approved."

In complying with my instructions from the honorable Secretary of State of the United States to bring the above recited information to your knowledge, it affords me pleasure to add that in the action of Mr. Christiancy at Lima, and the approval thereof by his government, the government and people of the United States of Colombiawill no doubt recognize a manifestation of the spirit of fraternal regard and friendlyconsideration which has always characterized the relations between the United States and Colombia.

With renewed assurances, &c.,

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,

Bogotá, March 26, 1881.

SIR: Your courteous communication of the 18th instant, in which you are pleased to transcribe a paragraph from the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, to the effect that the minister of said nation in Lima had assumed the protection of the Colombian citizens and their interests during the present war in Peru, has been received in this office.

The Colombian Government, by direct official correspondence, had already been informed of such fact as gratifying for it, as it was honorable for Mr. Christiancy and for the nation he so nobly represents, and had hastened through this department to give merited thanks to the worthy agent of the United States.

I have the honor to make known in this note, as you desire that in the proceeding of Mr. Christiancy, and in the approval of his conduct by his government, the Colombian Government and people recognize a manifestation of the spirit of fraternal regard that has existed until now in the relations of the two countries.

Renewing the expression of my distinguished consideration, I subscribe myself your very obedient servant,

[Extract.]

No. 263.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, April 16, 1881. (Received May 28.)

SIR: In my No. 215, of the 8th of last October, I reported an amicable settlement of the differences existing between Colombia and Costa Rica, relating to a question of disputed boundaries.

As at the time that dispatch was written the terms of the settlement could not be communicated, it may not be uninteresting to you to learn now that the final determination of the ownership of the disputed territory in question is to be left to arbitration, according to a treaty concluded by plenipotentiaries of Colombia and Costa Rica, which has been submitted to the Colombian Congress for legislative action thereon, the probabilities being that the action of the Colombian Congress will be favorable.

The first arbitrator named in the treaty is the King of the Belgians, and in the event of his inability or unwillingness to act, then the matter in dispute is to be left to the decision of the King of Spain, and if he should decline the trust, then the queston is to be submitted to the judgment of the President of the Argentine Republic.

The deep interest which you have manifested in your instructions to me, that the causes of the strained relations between the Governments of Colombia and Costa Rica might be removed in a friendly manner, perhaps justifies me in adding that, although the differences between these two neighboring republics might not seem to have been of sufficient importance to have called for the elaborate machinery which has been provided for their adjustment, it cannot be otherwise than gratifying to you to learn that by the proposed treaty, now awaiting approval by the Colombian Congress, the danger of a breach of the peace in Central America has been averted, and the anxiety in the public mind connected with that subject has been allayed.

No. 273.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, May 14, 1881. (Received June 21.)

SIR: Señor José Antonio Soffia, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Chili, was received in his official character by the President of Colombia on the 4th day of this month.

A certain amount of interest attaches to the mission of Señor Soffia on account of the questions pending between his government and that of Colombia, growing out of the alleged violation of neutrality by Colombia at the port of Panama in the war between Chili and the allied republics of Peru and Bolivia. It was thought here that the manner of adjusting these questions had been determined by the arbitration convention between Chili and Colombia, reported in my No. 205 of the 7th of last September, and that in the era of good feeling which was expected to follow the negotiation of that convention, the Government of Chili might even overlook its cause of complaint and not press for a settlement, but now it is learned that the Chilian Congress has adjourned without giving to the arbitration convention its legislative approval, and it appears as though the Government of Chili would prefer to adjust the pending differences with Colombia before giving its adhesion to the general application of the principle of international arbitration between the two countries.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

No. 204.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Dichman.

No. 169.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 26, 1881.

SIR: In your dispatch No. 235, date 20th December, 1880, you inclosed a proclamation of President Nuñez upon his return to the capital, in which he announces:

> The Government of Costa Rica, in a spirit of fraternity and justice certainly very worthy of praise and even of gratitude upon our part, hastened to repair the momentary offense as soon as it was able to comprehend that thus we considered the indiscreet act of its subordinate agents. The temporary and confidential mission, so ably acquitted of its obligation, that was charged with demanding the evacuation of our territory, has been finally replaced by one which should effect, by means of diplomatic discussion, a definite arrangement as to the ordinary question of boundaries, which will be eventually submitted to arbitration, in accordance with the resolve of the senate of Colombia in its last session.

I have since learned from Mr. Logan, our minister in Central America, under date January 25, 1881, that a convention between Costa Rica and Colombia was signed on the 25th December, 1880, ratified by the council of state of Costa Rica, signed by President Guardia, and transmitted to the Colombian Government for like ratification.

This convention refers the settlement of the disputed boundary to the arbitration of the King of Belgium; in case of his refusal, to the King of Spain; and should he decline, then to the President of the Argentine Republic.

You have not, in more recent dispatches, made further reference to the matter, and I am at present uninformed if any action has been taken by the Government of Colombia in ratification of this convention.

In your dispatch No. 187, date July 19, 1880, you indicate that the settlement of this boundary line will determine whether the islands in the neighborhood of the Boco del Torro, on the Atlantic coast, and the Gulf of Dolce, on the Pacific, be properly within the territory of the State of Panama or the Republic of Costa Rica.

If I have rightly understood you, therefore, this contention involves the question as to whether certain portions of the littoral on both oceans, lying in the neighborhood of some of the projected interoceanic communications, belong to the State of Panama, the neutrality and territorial integrity of which the United States of America have guaranteed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of 1846, or to Costa Rica, with whom our treaty relations are different.

Under these circumstances, while the Government of the United States of America does not expect or claim the position of necessary arbitrator in differences between those two republics, it cannot but seem strange that Colombia has not communicated to this government its intention to submit to arbitration the boundaries of the State of Panama, the territorial integrity of which the United States of America have guaranteed by a treaty, the provisions of which they have been more than once called on to execute.

As no official communication has been made to this government of the convention, and as we are still uninformed as to its ratification by the Government of Colombia, no formal representation can be made by you. But you will take an opportunity, as from yourself, not under instructions from but with full knowledge of your government, to say to the minister of foreign affairs that the Government of the United States of America cannot satisfactorily account for the absence of any official communication upon a subject in which it is so directly interested, and that while it recognizes the wisdom of the method of arbitration in the solution of international differences, and has no objection to urge to the arbitrators who have been named, it thinks that its opinion, both as to the character of the submission and the choice of arbitrator, should have been consulted and considered, and that it will not hold itself bound, where its rights, obligations, or interests may be concerned, by the decision of any arbitrator in whose appointment it has not been consulted, and in whose selection it has not concurred.

SIR: Your No. 269, of the 9th ultimo, reports the rumors which reach you, confidentially, to the effect that Colombia is seeking from the European powers some sort of joint declaration of the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, as well as of Colombian sovereignty over the territory thereof.

In view of like rumors which reached me from various channels, exhibiting a tendency on the part of some of the maritime powers to consider the expediency of uniting in such a guarantee, I had already prepared a circular instruction to the representatives of the United States in Europe, directing them in event of their having cause to believe that this movement is assuming tangible proportions to acquaint the respective governments to which they are accredited with the view of the President, that the exisiting guarantees, under the treaty of 1846 between the United States and Colombia, are complete and sufficient, and need no supplemental reinforcement from any other source.

I am not yet prepared to direct the communications of this dispatch in extenso to the Colombian Government, but if the feeling of excitement which arose on Señor Santo Domingo Vilas's return to Bogotá, and culminated in a request for your recall, should have yielded to a better spirit, showing a return of confidence, you may, if proper occasion offers, inform the Colombian secretary for foreign affairs of the stand taken by this government to check the apprehended movement of the powers of Europe in the direction of a joint guarantee, as needless, as offensive to Colombia and to the United States as well.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that the executive power of the Union has been pleased to appoint Mr. H. R. Lemly, a citizen of the United States of America, director, chief of studies of the School of Civil and Military Engineering of the Republic, and likewise that the Government of Colombia will direct the issue to the said Mr. Lemly of the commission of colonel in the Colombian army.

The executive power has desired to manifest in this manner its gratitude to Mr. Lemly for his especial devotion to duty, and for the zeal and interest in favor of this country that he has shown in the discharge of the duties of the professorship in the School of Engineering, to which he was called by virtue of a contract.

The ability of Mr. Lemly and the elevation of his character have merited the especial consideration of the Government of Colombia, which believes it a duty to inform your excellency of the above, as the representative here of the government and people of the great republic.

No. 303.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogotá, August 13, 1881. (Received October 8.)

SIR: Permit me to invite your attention to the accompanying publication, being a dispatch from the Colombian secretary of legation at Paris, purporting to give an account of an interview between that gentleman, General Sandford, and Mr. de Lesseps, during which the latter appears to have stated his views of the political questions connected with the proposed canal at some length and with considerable warmth of feeling, concerning which I only beg leave to observe that the statement concerning the neutrality of the Suez Canal is perhaps not strictly correct, for by means of the fortifications at Perim and the possession of Cyprus the British Government exercises a dominion over the Suez Canal as great as over any highway in the British Empire; and concerning the crowning of Mr. de Lesseps's career—to be killed at the Isthmus of Panama fighting for "the independence and integrity of Colombia," as he expresses it; that, I suppose, may be taken as a figure of speech prompted by the "noble outburst of enthusiasm" by which the Colombian secretary of legation says he was carried away.

Of course the opinions of Mr. de Lesseps are highly colored by the interest which he must feel in the success of his enterprise, and for the expression thereof he is, perhaps, not fairly subject to criticism.

I am, &c.,

ERNEST DICHMAN.

[Inclosure in No. 302.—Translation.]

Mr. Pereira to the Secretary of Foreign Relations of Colombia.

PARIS, June 24, 1881.

When I was introduced into the room in which was Mr. de Lesseps he was engaged in an animated conversation with the North American general, Mr. Henry Shelton Sandford (the same who went to Bogotá, in the years 1860 and 1861, with the double charge of representing there the North American Government and the Panama Railroad Company), whom he was endeavoring to convince that the American policy in questions relative to the canal showed great injustice and very little wisdom.

Upon my arrival he paused in order to present me to General Sandford, as the secretary of the Colombian legation in France, and to add that I could, without doubt, give him creditable information upon the latest phases of the subject. Introduced thus directly into the conversation I stated that I was unable to give them any authentic account of what had occurred, since I had received nothing; still less could I guarantee the authenticity of what the public press had published, but I was inclined to believe that at bottom there was much truth in what was said. According to the newspapers a protocol of conference had been signed in Washington, whose official text I did not know, but that I imagined would prove to be that given by the press; that our minister, in view, without doubt, of the gravity of the question, had believed it necessary to go in person to submit to the consideration of the Government of Bogotá the propositions of that of Washington; that in Colombia all this had caused much alarm, and that the Senate had unanimously authorized the executive power to denounce the treaty of 1846, upon the provisions of which the American Government based its pretensions to erect forts upon the isthmus.

"The question of the neutrality of the canal," said Mr. de Lesseps, "has no other true or practical solution than that which the logic and principles of international law indicate; to respect the sovereignty of Colombia in that territory. If Colombia permit, which she will not, that the United States construct fortresses there she will undoubtedly lose the isthmus. There remain to her, then, but two paths; to celebrate with the principal European maritime powers treaties similar to that which binds her to the United States, or denounce the latter contract, as the Senate has suggested, and which, without doubt, is the best that can be done if she would avoid complications in the future. Under any circumstances the diplomats will continue to agitate the question in order to arrange everything upon paper; but the important point is that meanwhile I may open the canal.

"Diplomacy has never served but to recognize accomplished facts. The sword or genius opens a highway according to its mode without caring for idle discussion, and diplomacy comes afterwards to say that what was done was well done. For more than thirty years I have served as a diplomat, and I have never had occasion to do otherwise.

"When it was proposed to open the Suez Canal, the same questions arose that arise to-day. All the powers began negotiations with the object of reaching a general agreement and guarantee in common the neutrality of the canal. The negotiations are still pending, but the question is resolved in the manner most simple and that best conduces to the interests of all. The men-of-war and the armies of all the nations of the earth may pass through without any distinction. In the last year 97,000 soldiers of different nations passed through the canal.

"England was no less hostile to the Suez Canal than the Americans show themselves to be to-day to that of Panama. Lord Palmerston directed various protests, full of threats, to the Ottoman Porte, with the object of forcing him to revoke the concession for the opening of the canal." * * *

"Lord Palmerston proved to be a great statesman," here interrupted Mr. Sandford.

"And nevertheless the English cabinet finally consented that the work of excavation should be begun when the enterprise was already almost completed.

"For that reason I say to Americans and Europeans, negotiate, negotiate as much as you wish, if before you have terminated your discussion I shall have opened the canal and solved the problem."

"But the conditions of the canal of Suez," objected the general, "were not the same as those of Panama. There the neutrality is effective, because it is to the interest of all the maritime powers of the first order; here we are the only maritime power menaced, and, it gives me pain to confess it, we have not a war marine that can advantageously oppose that of England for example. Our extensive Pacific coast is to-day well defended by two men of war; the canal opened, that defense would be insufficient. Ours is a country of work and of peace. We have no such armies as in Europe, and have cause to fear everything from a canal in which our preponderance shall not make itself exclusively felt."

"These fears, replied Mr. de Lesseps," are unfounded. To-day all nations desire peace and work. Without doubt, English fleets may pass through the canal, but yours, also, may do the same, and really this is not a serious argument. Every road brings us nearer, it is true, but it serves equally for offense as for defense. The navigation of the seas is free. No nation, be she perhaps the most powerful, may say to the others, 'Your ships cannot pass through here.' * * * "

"The canal is an artificial work that does not enter the case; it is the Strait of Gibraltar to America."

"That is an error; the canal as the strait is ever the sea. What I am going to do is join the waters of two oceans that nature has separated. Gibralter is an inaccessible rock, where, by an exceptional situation, the English have succeeded in fortifying themselves in what they won in honest war; but the same will not happen with Panama. This is an open territory of a sister nation of which you cannot possess yourselves without violating the law of nations nor without a struggle, long, tenacious, and without quarter. The Colombians have, as I, Spanish blood in their veins, and the last one will die rather than consent to such spoliation You are a great, strong, and rich nation; they, few in numbers, helpless and poor, but no matter. It will make no difference, because you cannot commit an act like that, which would be unworthy of such a people, which I am pleased to call the most advanced upon the globe. And, besides, it is not so easy as it would appear to conquer a nation, warlike and of such glorious traditions, that counts upon the immense moral force that justice, right, and the sympathies of the civilized world give it.

"As for me," he added in an outburst of noble enthusiasm, "I would be honored, to crown my career, to be killed there, defending with arms in my hand the independence and integrity of Colombia!"

His interlocutor, partly discomfited and part in doubt, said to him, "You are very young" "Not very," replied instantly the illustrious old man, "when I visited San Francisco and Chicago, I said to their people, who appeared to doubt the success of my enterprise, 'You are great cities, not one-third as old as I am, and it is very difficult to make me believe that you can doubt the incomparable power of labor, you who are its most surprising manifestation.'" And terminating the interview, he said to Mr. Sandford, "I return to the beginning. The canal will be built, and its neutrality will be preserved, not because diplomacy will resolve the question, but because it is demanded by the very nature of things, by universal interest and our own business (undertaking), which consists in the ships of all nations, whether men of war or merchantmen, passing through it without other condition than the payment of their respective contributions."

Such were, if not with his own words, the ideas expressed in substance by Mr. de Lesseps. Perhaps I may have misunderstood some point or committed errors, but, as the mail goes to-day, I have no time to correct the account I have just written; and thus I send it, hoping that the secretary will not ill receive the liberty I have taken.

I am, &c.,

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,
DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogotá, May 7, 1881.

SIR: Our representative at Washington having returned to this city, has laid before the government the minute or protocol which was signed by him conjointly with Mr. Trescot, your excellency's commissioner, in the city of New York, on the 17th day of February last, and which contains declarations with regard to the sense, scope, and manner of execution of article 35 of the treaty of 1846 between the two republics, in reference to the neutrality of transit across the Isthmus of Panama and the rights of sovereignty and dominion of Colombia over that portion of her territory.

After maturely considering the declarations made in that protocol in the name of this republic, my government regrets to find them at variance with the instructions which were transmitted to our representative, and with the means which we deem best adapted to prevent any extension of the obligations contracted by both nations by the treaty of 1846, and to avoid the dangers which might arise, both for them and for the other republic having territory on the Pacific from the substitution of a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Panama for the present barrier, which is the isthmus itself. Inasmuch as that work is to be for the benefit of the world's commerce, it is not just that it should entail exceptional charges or costs upon the nation that generously offers its territory for the purpose, or upon the American Government.

In view of these facts, and as Colombia has ever been actuated by an earnest desire to promote the safety and the commercial interests of both nations by reason of their mutual, firm, and sincere friendship, the government of the undersigned hopes that it will be able to continue the negotiations at Washington with as little delay as possible, and that the temporary interruption which has occurred will not be displeasing to your excellency, since the work of the canal has scarcely been commenced, and cannot be finished for a number of years to come.

With sentiments, &c.,

RICARDO BECERRA.

No. 210.

PROJECT OF PROTOCOL SUBMITTED BY COLOMBIAN MINISTER, GENERAL SANTO DOMINGO-VILA.

Considering that the United States of America, by section 1, article 35, of the treaty now in force between the two countries of the 12th of December, 1846, has bound itself to guarantee to the United States of Colombia their sovereignty over the territory called the Isthmus of Panama, and the neutrality of transit through that territory;

That the possible opening of the canal will render still graver the obligations contracted by the Government of the United States of America;

That it is the duty of Colombia to concur with the United States of America in the defense of her territory and the neutrality of the aquatic passage from one sea to the other;

The two governments, namely, the United States of Colombia and the United States of America, have agreed to amplify the existing treaty of peace, friendship, navigation, and commerce between the Republic of New Granada and the United States of America of the 12th of December, 1846, in the following terms:

I.

(A.)

For the purpose of the guarantee of the neutrality and the sovereignty of Colombia over the territory called the Isthmus of Panama, by the United States of America, according to the section and article above cited of the treaty of the 12th of December, 1846, it is understood that said territory is the same comprised at present in the State of Panama in the Colombian Union, and that the neutrality and sovereignty guaranteed embraced the entire extent of that territory.

(B.)

The guarantee of neutrality consists in this, that the United States of America shall, by all adequate measures, including a belligerent alliance with the United States of Colombia, prevent said territory from being converted into a theater of hostilities by any power or foreign force; and if this shall have taken place without it having been possible to prevent it in time, the United States of America shall assist with Colombia in its defense as long as hostilities last, and shall oblige the responsible power to make the proper reparation.

(C.)

The guarantee of sovereignty consists in this, that the United States of America shall, by the necessary measures, including the use of force, prevent the territory in question from being the object of conquest or usurpation, or of intrigues which shall tend to separate it from the Columbian Union, employed by any foreign power.

(D.)

The expenses incurred by the United States of America in the fulfillment of the engagements entered into for the defense of the sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus of Panama and its neutrality shall be at the charge of the Treasury of the United States of America.

II.

With the object of facilitating to the United States of America the fulfillment of the obligations which they have contracted by the treaty of the 12th of December, 1846, to which the foregoing article refers, the two contracting parties have agreed as follows:

(A.)

Colombia will lend to the Government of the United States of America all the facilities which may be in her power, including permission for the temporary occupation of the territory threatened or invaded, as long as the emergency may last.

(B.)

The Governments of Colombia and of the United States of America, of common accord, shall designate on the coasts of the Isthmus of Panama two places where there may be erected works of defense, permanent or temporary, where there may be established coaling stations for the provision of the naval forces which the two nations may have at their service.

(C.)

As long as there is no occasion for the United States of America to assist with Colombia in the defense of the sovereignty of the latter over the territory of the Isthmus of Panama and in the maintenance there of neutrality, the custody of the defensive works which may be constructed shall be at the charge of the Government of Colombia.

(D.)

The American forces destined by the Government of the United States of America to act in concurrence with those of the Government of Colombia in the defense of the sovereignty and neutrality of the territory of the isthmus in their relations with the Colombian authorities shall exercise their functions in the territory of Colombia in the same terms which the constitution prescribes for their exercise by the national forces of Colombia.

(E.)

The military operations shall be under the charge of the commander-in-chief of the Colombian or American forces who may hold the greater number of military stations in the field of operations.

(F.)

In case the President of Colombia shall assume the command of the Columbian armies, and shall be present in the field of operations, these forces, and those of the allied armies employed there, shall act under his immediate command.

(G.)

With the exception of the case which is merely possible, not probable—and please God never shall occur—of war between the United States of Colombia and the United States of America, transit shall be permitted through the above-mentioned canal; first, to the ships of war of the United States of America at all times, whether the United States are or are not engaged in war; second, of the troops of their Army or Navy which it may be necessary to transport from one shore to the other of the American Union, with the proviso that they shall pass without arms through the waters of the canal and integral part of the Colombian territory; and thirdly, of every class of supplies for the service of men-of-war and of troops.

III.

For the security of transit through the Isthmus of Panama against internal political disorders, the Government of the United States of Colombia will always maintain in that territory a national armed force sufficient to preserve tranquillity and public security against revolution, mutiny, or disorder of any kind.

IV.

For the fulfillment of the obligations contracted in the present treaty, the two contracting parties shall proceed always in good faith and entirely in accord.

COUNTER-PROJECT FROM THE DEPARTMENT.

Whereas the United States of America, by section I, article 35, of the treaty now in force between the two countries of the 12th of December, 1846, have bound themselves to guarantee to the United States of Colombia their sovereignty over the Isthmus of Panama and the neutrality of transit through that territory;

Whereas the possible opening of an interoceanic canal through the said isthmus will render still graver and more onerous the obligations contracted by the Government of the United States of America;

And whereas it is the duty of the United States of Colombia to support and facilitate the United States of America in the maintenance and protection of the sovereignty and neutrality of the said isthmus;

Now, therefore, the two governments have agreed:

I.

That all concessions or grants heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, by the Government of the United States of Colombia for the purpose of securing the completion of an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama are, and shall be subject to the rights accruing to the United States of America in virtue of the guarantee by the said United States of America in the thirty-fifth article of said treaty, and the exercise of which may become necessary for the proper discharge of the obligations therein undertaken. And no such concession or modification of any such concession, can or shall be hereafter made without the consent of the said United States of America.

And in execution of this provision, any such concession, made or to be made, shall receive the approval of the said United States of America before the work authorized by such concession shall be undertaken or commenced.

II.

That while the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over the territory of the said isthmus shall not be divested, the use of the said canal shall be as free to the government and citizens of the United States of America as to the government and citizens of the United States of Colombia; and the government and citizens of the United States of America shall be subject to no other tolls or conditions upon its use than are charged upon the government and citizens of the United States of Colombia.

Whenever the canal shall become the property, or shall come into the beneficial possession of the United States of Colombia, the Government of the United States of Colombia shall hold it as a trust for the commercial world, collecting only such tolls as are necessary for its proper administration and as reasonable revenue to that government, according to its general taxation of real and personal property.

III.

That, in order to maintain efficaciously the said guarantee, the Government of the United States of America shall have the right to occupy and fortify such places in the ports and harbors at the termini of the said canal as may be deemed by the said government necessary and fit for the establishment of coaling stations, naval depots, ship-yards, and docks; and the Government of the United States of America shall have the further right to establish and occupy at the entrances of said canal, or along the line of its construction, such fortifications as the said government may deem necessary for the maintenance and protection of the neutrality of said canal and the sovereignty of the said United States of Colombia. And the selection of such naval stations and the location of such fortifications shall be made by the two governments, and they shall together regulate the mode and extent of the occupation thereof; and the expense of their construction, maintenance, and occupation shall be at the cost of the United States of America.

IV.

That in time of peace the canal shall be free and open to the mercantile marine of all nations upon payment of the tolls and compliance with the regulations which may be established therefor under the supervision and with the consent of the two governments. And in time of war, the two governments agree that neither will exercise the belligerent right of capture, detention, or blockage of merchant vessels within the limits of said canal, its ports, harbors, or dependencies, and such distance of open sea as may hereafter be determined, against the merchant vessels of any power which has, by treaty stipulation with the United States of America and the United States of Colombia, agreed to respect the neutrality of said isthmus.

V.

That the canal is closed, as matter of right, both in time of peace and war, to the naval vessels, or military transports whether of troops or munitions, of all nations, except the two contracting governments; but the said governments hereby agree to declare open to all vessels of war the harmless use of the canal communication in time of peace, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the said two contracting governments may jointly adopt.

TENDENCIES OF THE DRAFT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF COLOMBIA.

1. To recognize that the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama increases the obligations contracted by the United States of America by article 35 of the treaty of 1846, which is now in force between the two nations; and to manifest the willingness of Colombia to facilitate the fulfillment of said obligations.

2. To determine the territory referred to by the guarantee of the sovereignty of Colombia over the isthmus and of the neutrality of transit.

3. To define the circumstances under which it shall be the duty of the United States to assist Colombia in the defense of the guaranteed territory.

4. To state with precision the facilities which Colombia is ready to lend the United States for the fulfillment of the obligations contracted by them, among others, the designation, by common consent, by the two governments, of the places requiring temporary or permanent fortifications, of places suitable for coaling stations for the vessels of both nations, the occupation by force of the United States of America, of the territory threatened or invaded, so long as the emergency shall last, and free passage through the canal for the war-vessels of the United States.

TENDENCIES OF THE DRAFT PRESENTED BY THE HON. SECRETARY OF STATE.

1st. Article 2 tends to modify article 6 of the Salgar-Wyse convention.

2d. Article 3 is based upon the idea of the fortification and permanent occupation of the canal and its appurtenances by forces of the United States of America.

3d. Articles 4 and 5 tend to modify article 5 of the Salgar-Wyse convention.

It may easily be deduced from the comparison made, that articles 2, 4, and 5 of the draft of the honorable Secretary of State are open to the same objections as article 1, which it has been determined not to discuss, in view of the fact that the undersigned minister does not consider himself authorized to agree in the name of his government to any deviation from the Salgar-Wyse convention, without the consent of the other party that has contracted with Colombia, which reason induced the undersigned to abstain from entering upon any discussion on the basis of article 1 of the draft of the Hon. Secretary of State, and to solicit fresh instructions from his government.

With respect to article 3 of the draft of the Hon. Secretary of State, the undersigned takes the liberty to observe that if the fortification of the territory in question is to take place before the occurrence of the danger from which it is sought to guard that territory, he does not think that the permanent occupation of said territory by the forces of the United States of America is indispensable, or even necessary, especially since Colombia will, the case arising, keep such an armed force on the isthmus as may be necessary to protect the canal from surprise, thus giving the United States time, in any event, to come to its aid.

The undersigned, as he stated in the draft which he submitted to the consideration of the Hon. Secretary of State, would be willing to agree to permanent fortification, but only to temporary occupation; that is, during the prevalence of the danger recognized by the Government of Colombia.

R. STO. DOMINGO VILA.

WASHINGTON, February 12, 1881.

MEMORANDUM OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE ON THE COLOMBIAN PROJECT AND COUNTER-PROJECT.

The project submitted by the Colombian minister recites that it is based upon three considerations:

1. That there is an existing guarantee of the neutrality of the isthmus and of the sovereignty of Colombia over the isthmian territory, assumed by and now obligatory on the United States by virtue of thirty-fifth article, treaty of 1846.

2. That the probable opening of an interoceanic canal communication through the isthmus renders still graver these treaty obligations.

That Colombia is bound to concur with the United States in the maintenance of this guarantee of neutrality and sovereignty.

In the value of these considerations the United States concur, and both parties are therefore agreed upon the reasons which render important stipulations in development and explanation of the former treaty.

The United States do not consider it necessary to describe more specifically the boundaries of the territory covered by the guarantee than they were defined and understood at the date of the treaty. Nor does it seem desirable to attempt a more precise description of the obligations of the guarantee than the treaty contains. The provisions of the treaty are sufficiently full and accurate in the description of the obligations of the guarantee, and the United States do not desire either on the one hand to limit its existing responsibility or on the other to increase or extend its obligations. Besides which the provisions of any supplemental treaty which may be agreed upon will, by the practical details for the execution of the guaranteee which it may furnish, sufficiently define and limit the character of the treaty obligation for the execution of which it provides.

ARTICLE I.

This article declares that all concessions or grants heretofore made or hereafter to be made by the Colombian Government, for the execution of an interoceanic canal, are and shall be subject, in virtue of the guarantee of the thirty-fifth article, to the approval of the United States.

The Colombian minister objects to this, that it is inadmissible so far only as concerns any concession heretofore regularly made by the Colombian Government, for such concession must be considered as an executed contract. He recognizes as not unreasonable the right of the United States to demand the preliminary of their consent to any new concession or to the modification of any one now existing. Putting aside a discussion of the principle involved in this objection, it would seem quite possible to find ground for substantial agreement by so shaping the practical articles of the proposed supplemental treaty as to protect the rights of the United States accruing under the thirty-fifth article from any invasion by the grants of the concession. For if the sovereignty and character of Colombia are concerned in the maintenance of a contract which, however inadvertently as far as the rights and interests of the United States are concerned, it has regularly and formally executed, that sovereignty and character are none the less concerned in the maintenance of a treaty, which is a higher contract of an older date. Besides, as the text of the concession is now before both governments, it would be convenient to their common interests and obligations under the existing treaty, for the United States to assign the clauses or provisions in the concession which seem objectionable, and for Colombia to undertake for their modification by the grantees, or, if impracticable, accept the protest of the United States as to their being inoperative as against the United States.

ARTICLE II.

This article provides that while the sovereignty of Colombia shall not be divested, the use of the said canal shall be as free to the government and citizens of the United States as to the government and citizens of Colombia.

The details of this article need not be recapitulated, for the objection of the Colombian minister seems to be confined to the claim of equality of use of the canal by the government, although the commercial use by the citizens of the United States is not questioned.

The difficulty seems to arise from the provisions of the Wyse concession, which (article 6) declares:

> The United States of Colombia reserve to themselves the right to pass their vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying any dues whatever.

This provision is supposed to confer upon the holders of the concession the right to impose dues upon the vessels, troops, and munitions of war of all other nations, and, therefore, to be incompatible with the right claimed by the United States of the free and equal use of the canal by the government as well as by citizens.

This concession was granted in 1878.

In 1846, in the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of that date, "the Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama, upon any modes of communication that now exist or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the government and citizens of the United States," and then goes on to provide that no other tolls or charges for the use of this communication shall be levied upon the citizens of the United States than are levied upon the citizens of New Granada.

The stipulation is clear and explicit that the communication is "open and free to the Government" of the United States, and "open and free to the citizens" of the United States, subject in case of the citizens to the collection of the same dues collected from citizens of New Granada.

And in order to secure themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages * * * the United States guarantee positively and efficaciously, &c.

That is to say, the United States guarantee the neutrality of the isthmus and the sovereignty of Colombia over its territory, upon the express condition that the canal communication shall be open and free absolutely to the government and open and free conditionally to the citizens of the United States, the conditions being the same imposed upon Granadian citizens. Under this article the United States may justly claim that the freedom of use of the canal was theirs absolutely, whether the Colombian Government consented or not to the payment of toll for that use; but all they have asked is that the use of the United States shall be the same as the use of Colombia.

And it surely must have occurred to the Colombian minister that, if this right to levy toll upon the Government of the United States by the holders of the concession be admitted, the United States might find themselves not prevented from discharging the obligation of their guarantee, but annoyed and encumbered with heavy impositions and burdensome regulations whenever Colombia might require the use of their vessels, troops, or munitions of war in execution of the guarantee.

It cannot be supposed that the United States ever contemplated such a condition; and the language of the Colombian minister in reference to the obligation of the Colombian Government to maintain its concession once guaranteed would sufficiently justify the United States in declining to believe that the Colombian Government has ever intended or would now undertake to subordinate the provisions of the elder treaty to the stipulations of the later grant.

If this error has been inadvertently committed, it is for the Colombian Government to correct it; and, should that government deem it needful, no difficulty ought to be anticipated in obtaining from the holders of the concession the requisite consent.

Article III.

This article recognizes that, in order efficaciously to execute its guarantee, the United States should be provided with a necessary base both for military and naval operations, and refers the method of such preparation to a future convention.

The Colombian minister, both in his project and conversation, accepts the principle of this article. He desires to limit its execution by the condition that in time of peace, and when no hostile exigency is apparent to the two governments, the occupation of military positions should be entrusted to the Colombian Government, with such provision for the preservation of war material and fortifications as the United States might desire.

This suggestion would not be unfavorably received if confined to fortifications along the line of construction and perfected in detail by a convention. It could scarcely apply to naval stations, coal depots, or dock-yards, which would from their character have to be held in continuous possession and occupation by the power using them.

But it would seem that there is no important difference on this article. Its principle is recognized by both governments; it contains in itself provision for a convention to regulate details; and it is certain that neither the United States nor Colombia will desire to go to the heavy expense of military preparation without absolute necessity and the fullest opportunity for concerted action.

ARTICLE IV.

This article provides that in time of peace the canal shall be free and open to the mercantile marine of all nations, upon payment of tolls and compliance with the regulations which may be established therefor under the supervision and with the consent of the two governments.

This consent of the two governments, as a preliminary to the establishment of tolls and regulations, is supposed to interfere with the right conferred by the concession upon its holders to determine the tolls and make the necessary regulations for the use of the canal.

Still waiving the question whether the consent of the United States to any concession is not made requisite by the thirty-fifth article, and assuming that the tolls and regulations do not infringe upon any right of the Government of the United States secured by the older treaty, this objection might be considered and obviated by an acceptance on the part of the United States of the tolls and regulations as ascertained by the concession, if found reasonable, with the understanding or stipulation, however, that, in case of difference between the holders of the concession and the Colombian Government, the Government of the United States shall be consulted and its consent obtained to any change or settlement.

ARTICLE V.

This article provides that the canal is closed, as matter of right, in time of peace and war, to the naval vessels or military transports of all nations, without the consent of the two governments.

It is suggested by the Colombian minister that this is also an infringement of the right secured to the holders of the concession to levy tolls, &c., on the naval vessels of all nations except Colombia.

Article 5 of the concession does not seem to warrant this construction. Why it does not apply to the United States Government has been already stated.

As to other nations, all that article 5 strictly and properly interpreted gives to the holders of the concession, is the right to levy toll upon the war vessels and transports of all nations except Colombia, if they are allowed to pass. But there is no obligation assumed by Colombia that they shall be allowed to pass. That is a question which, as to every nation other than the United States, Colombia must decide according to her interests, and it cannot be supposed that Colombia has in this article so far abdicated not only her sovereignty but her duty to regard what may be great political and territorial interests, as to deprive herself (in connection with her guarantor) of the right forever, under any and all circumstances, of closing the canal in times of peace to all war vessels. If this construction be correct then the right of the holders of the concession to levy tolls, when such vessels pass, is not taken away by the preservation of the right of Colombia to decide that "when."

Besides which, this article contains a declaration that both governments will agree that the canal shall be open to the harmless use of war vessels in time of peace, subject to such cautionary regulations as they may agree upon. And this would seem to remove the practical difficulty suggested as arising from article 5 of the concession.

Mr. Evarts to Mr. Trescot.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 15, 1881.

SIR: You will receive herewith a copy of a memorandum indicating the subject and scope of a conference between the Colombian minister and myself in relation to certain projects of treaty which have been considered by us. You are already advised of the general situation of the subject as hitherto treated between this government and that of Colombia.

You will proceed to New York, and in an interview with the Colombian minister, who has been advised of your coming, you will, guided by this memorandum, submit to him the views of this Department.

Should the result of your conference be an indication on his part of his authority and readiness to conclude a treaty upon the modifications suggested, you will inform him that I am prepared to renew our conferences upon that basis in the expectation of a conclusive arrangement. But if, as is more probable, you find that he considers himself only authorized to refer to his government the views entertained between you, your object will be by free and frank consultation to ascertain how far his opinions and those expressed by me in the memorandum, promise the possibility of an accord, upon the subjects embraced, which will justify positive instructions in that sense to the United States minister at Bogotá.

You will bring or forward a report of your interview in the shape of a précis of the conversation between you.

It is hoped that such a report can reach this Department in time for the next mail to Panama. But if you find this impossible, you will inclose a copy of such report in the letter addressed to Mr. Dichman, which is sent you with this, and mail the letter and inclosure so as to secure its transmission from New York by the mail which leaves immediately after your interview with the Colombian minister.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts to General Santo Domingo.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 15, 1881.

MY DEAR GENERAL SANTO DOMINGO: I have the pleasure to introduce to you the Hon. William H. Trescot, who has received from me instructions and authority to continue, on the part of the Department, the conferences which have engaged our attention up to the moment of your leaving Washington.

However much I may regret that you have thought yourself obliged to leave this capital with our conferences not advanced to a conclusive result, I deem myself fortunate in being able to confide the further treatment of the matter to so experienced and accomplished a representative of the views of the Department as Mr. Trescot. He has become fully possessed of the whole posture of the two governments, as it has appeared in the treatment of the subject between us, and of the views which I should further have pressed upon your attention had you remained in Washington. He will, I hope, receive the same confidence on your part in meeting these views in the same frankness that you would if offered by myself.

I venture to anticipate that you may be able to come to such an accord as may furnish the material of a preliminary protocol, if not of a definitive convention.

Wishing you a prosperous voyage, I am, my dear general, yours, very truly,

WM. M. EVARTS.

Mr. Trescot to Mr. Evarts.

WASHINGTON, February 18, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a protocol signed on the 17th February, 1881, by General Santo Domingo Vila, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Government of the United States of Colombia, and myself, representing the Secretary of State of the United States of America, under instructions from you.

At my first interview with General Santo Domingo, I submitted to him the memorandum with which I was furnished by you, containing a précis of the character and scope of the conferences heretofore had between yourself and the Colombian minister.

You will find, I hope, that the protocol contains sufficiently full and satisfactory declarations upon the points under discussion, with the exception, perhaps, of the provision of the first article of the project which you submitted to his consideration.

That article was intended to declare that any concession for the execution of an interoceanic canal, heretofore made or hereafter to be made by the United States of Colombia, was and should be subject to the rights of the United States of America as guarantor of the neutrality of the isthmus and of the sovereignty of Colombia over isthmian territory secured to the United States by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of 1846, and that the consent of the United States of America must be considered as a preliminary necessary to the validity of any future grant or the modification of any existing one.

General Santo Domingo recognized that no rights secured to this government by the older treaty could be subordinated to rights conferred by the more recent concession; and in the first declaration of the protocol it was distinctly declared that the right of the Government of the United States to the free use of the canal for its war vessels was superior to the right granted the holders of the concession, in article 5, to levy tolls upon all such vessels, except only the war vessels of Colombia.

He was unwilling to make such a declaration as seemed to him to imply that there had been such an infringement of our treaty rights by the grants of the concession, which, as a fact, he did not admit. He thought the relations established by the treaty made the right of the United States so plain to insist upon the observance of article 35 and to lay before the Colombian Government, by protest or otherwise, any provision of the concession which was deemed an infraction of the treaty, as to require no more specific declaration. But he was not willing to accept the protest of the United States as, ipso facto, rendering any provision of the concession which might be complained of inoperative, for that would seem to dispense with the necessity of amicable consultation for the purpose of removing the supposed difficulties. If such consultation reached no satisfactory solution, the power and right of the United States were indisputable, and the question would be then one of those in which each government would be free to maintain its position by adequate means and in view of its general interests.

As the first declaration of the protocol had recognized, in the only practical case, the superiority of the treaty obligation; as the other declarations established an accord between the two governments in the construction of the rights secured by article 35 of the treaty; and as the Government of the United States had, in former diplomatic communications to Colombia, indicated its dissatisfaction with the grant of the Wyse-Salgar concession without its previously obtained consent, and had explicitly informed the Colombian Government that the necessity for such consent was and would be maintained as a consequence and function of the guarantee undertaken by the treaty of 1846—1 deemed it best not to press further the present consideration of article 1 of the project, and to reach, if possible, a practical accord which might even deprive its future discussion of any large consequence.

This, I think, was reached in the third declaration of the protocol, in which Colombia accepts the concurrence of the United States in any modification of the tolls and regulations of the canal-transit now established, which, for any cause Colombia may see fit to require. The cause for such intervention on the part of Colombia might be any apparent conflict between the rights secured by treaty and such as are granted by concession.

The other declarations of the protocol would seem to cover all the provisions of the project:

1. The equal freedom of the use of the canal by the governments as well as by the citizens of Colombia and the United States.

2. The authority of the United States, in execution of its guarantee, to occupy the territory of the isthmus and to provide the necessary basis for military and naval operations; and the adoption, by convention, of such methods as may be found most fitting for the co-operation of the two governments.

3. The right of the two governments to close the canal in time of peace to the war vessel of all other nations.

In discussing this last declaration, General Santo Domingo recognized that a contingency might arise in which the interests of the United States would require the canal to be closed to the war vessels of some other nation, and the relations of the two nations were such as to justify the United States in expecting the concurrence of Colombia. But in such case he observed that the nation so excluded might resent the exclusion even to war, and that the guarantee of the United States was confined to the isthmus, and the rest of Colombia would be thus exposed to hostile demonstration without responsibility on the part of the United States for its defense.

While, therefore, willing to accept the general principle that, as matter of right, the canal should be closed to the war vessels of all nations other than the two contracting parties, in time of peace, but that its innocent use should be allowed to such vessels, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the two powers might jointly adopt, he thought that in case the United States required such closing of the canal, it should be prepared to co-operate with Colombia in the resistance of any attack that might be made on its sovereignty or territory in consequence of such action.

This condition seemed to me so reasonable and was in fact so entirely the line of conduct which the United States would have necessarily to adopt, if the circumstances occurred, that I had no hesitation in shaping the declaration as you will find it in the protocol; stating clearly and explicitly the principle of the closing of the canal in time of peace to the war vessels of other nations, and defining with precision the obligation which the United States would assume in the contingency contemplated.

Having reached this accord, I informed General Santo Domingo that I was authorized to say that "you were prepared to renew your conferences upon that basis, in the expectation of a conclusive arrangement."

He replied, that the necessity for his immediate departure was urgent and his presence as a member of the Colombian Senate of pressing importance; that our accord, formulated in a protocol, would enable him to lay the whole subject before the Colombian Government in such a light as to secure a treaty on that basis, either through the official action of the United States minister at Bogotá, or through renewed negotiation with him on his return here in June.

Under these circumstances, I felt that I was best carrying out my instructions by signing the protocol, and submitting it for your approval.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

WM. HENRY TRESCOT.

PROTOCOL.

The United States of Colombia recognizing—

That the construction of an interoceanic canal through the Isthmus of Panama will render more onerous the obligations of the United States of America assumed by the said United States in the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of 1846, between the United States of America and the United States of Colombia, then known as the Republic of New Grenada;

That the United States of Colombia are bound to concur with the United States of America in the maintenance of the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama and of the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over the territory of the said isthmus, guaranteed by the thirty-fifth article of the said treaty;

General Santo Domingo Vila, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of Colombia to the United States of America, and William Henry Trescot, of South Carolina, for that purpose authorized and empowered to represent the Secretary of State of the United States of America, have signed this protocol, containing the following declarations:

I.

That, in conformity with the above-recited treaty of 1846, any interoceanic communication through the Isthmus of Panama, by canal or otherwise, shall be as free and open to the government and citizens of the United States of America as to the government and citizens of the United States of Colombia, except in case, which God forbid, of war between the two nations.

II.

The two governments will by common accord select such points in the territory of said isthmus as they may deem proper for fortification, temporary or permanent, and for military and naval depots, coaling-stations, and dock-yards, and will provide by convention for the occupation and establishment of such depots, stations, and fortifications.

And if the case contemplated in article 35 of the treaty of 1846 should occur and the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over the Isthmus of Panama, or the neutrality of the transit across said isthmus, be threatened, the United States of America are authorized to occupy and maintain such threatened territory during the existence of such exigency in co-operation with the military forces of Colombia and in the defense of said sovereignty and territory.

But it is also understood that in time of peace, and no exigency existing in the judgment of the two governments, no military force (other than such detail as may be arranged by the two governments for the repair and preservation of fortifications and military stores, and the maintenance of docks, naval stations, and coal depots) shall occupy the said fortifications or be stationed within the said territory, except such military forces as shall belong to the United States of Colombia.

III.

That in case the United States of Colombia find cause to intervene for the modification of the tolls or regulations established by the holders of any concession of the said government for the execution of said inter-oceanic communication, the Government of the United States of Colombia will accept the concurrence of the United States of America in the adjustment of such tariff.

IV.

As the United States of Colombia and the United States of America are the only nations who have by treaty guaranteed the neutrality of transit across the Isthmus of Panama, and as the United States of America have further by treaty guaranteed the sovereignty of the United States of Colombia over the territory of said isthmus, the canal shall not be considered open as matter of right in time of peace to the war vessels or military transports of any nations except the said United States of Colombia and United States of America. But the said two contracting parties agree that they will declare the said canal open to the innocent use of the war vessels of other nations, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the said two contracting governments may jointly adopt.

But it is understood that if at any time the two governments should concur in withdrawing such declaration and closing the canal to the war vessels of other nations, and danger should threaten the sovereignty or territory of the United States of Colombia in consequence of such action, the United States of America will co-operate with the United States of Colombia in the means necessary for the defense of the sovereignty and territory so threatened.

Signed by us in the city of New York, on the seventeenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one.

WM. HENRY TRESCOT.
SANTO DOMINGO VILA.

The ageement upon the points embraced in this protocol of the same accords with my views and has received the approval of the President.

The question, however, as to whether other points might not need to be entertained as a part of a formal convention on the basis of article 35 of the treaty of 1846 is not understood by me to be precluded by this protocol.

WM. M. EVARTS.

FEBRUARY 18, 1881.

General Santo Domingo to Mr. Evarts.

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA IN WASHINGTON,
NEW YORK, February 18, 1881.

SIR: The undersigned, minister of Colombia, has the honor to inform his excellency the Secretary of State that yesterday he and the Hon. William Henry Trescot, as the representative of his excellency, signed the protocol of this same date, in which are embraced the most important points relating to the guarantee of the sovereignty of Colombia in the Isthmus of Panama and the neutrality of the interoceanic passage [via] to be opened there, according to the treaty of 1846 existing between this and that republic.

Having little time at his disposal, as the undersigned is on the point of starting for Colombia, he limits himself to giving this notice to his excellency, adding at the same time the expression of his sincere desire that the bases agreed upon may soon acquire the form of a complete treaty, which will doubtless be the case before long.

The undersigned takes leave of his excellency renewing the assurances of his high consideration and esteem.

R. STO. DOMINGO VILA.

[Translation of papers published by authority of the Colombian Government in Diario Oficial, Bogota, May 27, 1881.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The government has ordered the following documents to be published, relating to negotiations referring to the neutrality of the Panama Canal, and the guarantee of the dominion and sovereign rights of Colombia in that territory:

I.

PROJECT OF PROTOCOL*—EVARTS–AROSEMENA.

At a meeting for this purpose between the undersigned, William M.

* This protocol "formed the subject of several conferences at Washington, between Dr. Justo Arosemena (the former Colombian minister), and myself. This draft was proposed by Dr. Arosemena, and not found acceptable by Mr. Evarts, to whom it was submitted informally by me." (Extract from Mr. Dichman's No. 272.)

Evarts, Secretary of State of United States of America, and Dr. Justo Arosemena, minister resident of the United States of Colombia at Washington, taking into consideration that in view of the possibility of the present or future opening of a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, across the Isthmus of Panama, which canal will affect the interests of the United States in a notable manner, and whereas the first paragraph of article 35 of the treaty existing between both nations, dated December 12, 1846, contains important stipulations, not well defined, but which, with a clear understanding, will provide for all necessities which for both countries will arise from or be augmented by the opening of said canal, the undersigned, being fully empowered by their respective governments, have agreed upon the following declarations:

1. (a) Whereas the first paragraph of the thirty-fifth article of the treaty of December 12, 1846, concedes to the Government of the United States, as well as to their citizens, the free right of way by whatever means of communication which exist, or which may be constructed in future, it permits virtually the transit through said canal—

1st. For all vessels of war of the United States at all times, whether the United States find themselves engaged in war or not.

2d. For the troops of their Army or Navy which they may find necessary to transport from one coast of the United States to the other; provided that the troops pass disarmed through the waters of the canal, which are an integral part of Colombian territory.

3d. For munitions of war for the service of the vessels and troops.

(b) From this concession, to which the paragraph refers, is excepted the case, barely possible, but not probable, and which God grant will never take place, of a war between the United States of Colombia and between the United States of America, in which eventuality, and while the same continues, the latter power shall not be permitted (free) to transport through the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war.

2. (a) Concerning the neutrality of and sovereignty of Colombia over the territory called the Isthmus of Panama, guaranteed by the United States of America, according to the paragraph and article cited from the treaty of 1864, it is understood that said territory is the same as is now embraced by the State of Panama in the Colombian Union, and that the neutrality and sovereignty guaranteed applies to the whole extent of said territory.

(b) The guarantee of neutrality consists in that the United States of America will prevent, by all adequate means, including that of making themselves belligerents as allies of the United States of Colombia, that said territory be made the theater of hostilities by any foreign power; or if it shall have taken place, the same not having been opportunely prevented, the United States of America will come to the defense while said hostilities continue, and compel the responsible (respective) power to make due reparation.

(c) The guarantee of sovereignty consists in that the United States of America will prevent, by all necessary means, including the use of force, that the territory referred to be made the object of conquest or usurpation, or of invidious steps tending to separate it from the Colombian Union by any foreign power or unauthorized private expeditions.

3d. In order to enable the United States of America to comply with the duties which they have under the treaty and to which the foregoing paragraph refers, they will employ, with all prudence, the indispensable measures while the emergency exists for which they are necessary. For this purpose and for their security, they will receive from the United States of Colombia all the facilities which they may have in their power, including the temporary occupation of the territory which may be threatened or invaded, and the right to fortify, also temporary, the places which may require it, both parties interested proceeding always in good faith and entirely in accord.

4th. (a) As soon as the above declarations shall have been definitely approved by the governments which the undersigned represent, they shall be held as an explanation of the article of the treaty of 1846 to which they refer, and they shall continue as a part thereof during the existence of the treaty, according to the third paragraph of the same article.

(b) And whereas said declarations refer to the understanding (tenor) of an article of the treaty which may have an actual application, it is understood that they shall control, in order to decide any questions which may arise from the same, independently of the opening of an interoceanic canal.

In faith whereof, &c.

II.

PART REFERRING TO THE INSTRUCTIONS FORWARDED TO THE MINISTER OF COLOMBIA IN WASHINGTON.

With regard to the interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama, which seems to present some chance of being realized, you will naturally do whatever may be in your power to persuade the United States Government that the existing treaty between Colombia and the United States gives to the latter power all the influence that need be desired over the enterprise, besides which the said treaty may be amplified in any sense the United States might consider convenient, by affirming the Monroe doctrine, to which the United States of Colombia adheres without the slightest reservation. Your predecessor, Dr. Arosemena, drew up the project of a protocol extending that article of the treaty which refers to the transit across the Isthmus of Panama and duly forwarded it to the Secretary of State, but this functionary failed to take the matter into consideration, probably because the circumstances were unfavorable on account of the electioneering excitement. While the negotiation progresses, you may hint, directly in the same sense he did, employing therein all the prudence which distinguishes your character, and in case your insinuation should be well received, you may proceed to modify the treaty, adopting as a guide the before-mentioned project of protocol, which ought to be in the archives of the Colombian legation.

IV.

NOTE OF THE NEGOTIATING MINISTER UPON THE FORMER PROTOCOL.

COLOMBIAN LEGATION IN WASHINGTON,
In Commission—Bogotá, April 22, 1881.

MR. SECRETARY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS: Having been authorized by the citizen President of the Republic to present myself in this capital to render an account of the mission confided to me to the United States of America, I have the pleasure to hand to the department of foreign affairs a detailed report comprehending the course and termination of the negotiations in question, thus complying with the instructions communicated to me dated November 1, 1880.

For the purpose of making the narrative more simple and in order, I will treat each one of the points indicated in the instructions separately, taking them in the order therein established.

(B.) The first point of the instructions says as follows:

> It being of the highest importance that Colombia should maintain the most cordial relations with the United States, you will not omit, during your mission, any means to attain this object, provided they be legitimate and honorable. You are aware that certain complications may arise with the neighboring republics, in which case it is necessary that we should possess in the United States, if not an ally, at least a decided friend to interpose his influence and weight in America, in order to avoid conflicts which might eventually terminate in fratricidal war, like that which for the last year past has been desolating three republics of the Pacific, and which we ought to endeavor to avoid by every means consistent with the national honor.

From the correspondence which has passed between the legation and the American Government, it will be seen that the relations between the two countries have been maintained upon the best footing, notwithstanding the situation certainly at times disturbed, which the publications of the official press created for me for a short period with respect to the enterprise of the Interoceanic Canal of Panama, and the manifest tendencies of the United States Government to, in my opinion, exercise a galling superintendence over all the interoceanic routes, derogatory to the sovereignty of Colombia. Nevertheless, by means of my official correspondence, as well as private conferences with the Hon. Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, I have endeavored, and, in fact, have obtained, in my opinion, a plan to conciliate the defense of the rights and sovereignty of Colombia with the good understanding recommended, calculated to promote rather than retard a convenient solution of the important negotiations to which the instructions refer.

The points 2, 3, 4, and 5 apply to the convention made in this city with the representative of the Government of Chili, respecting the conservation of peace between the two republics; to the circular communicated in consequence by the Government of Colombia to the republican governments of South America, inviting them to send representatives to Panama in the month of September next, to form part of that convention and observe the method observed for the discussion and adoption of the bases for a complete code of international law for South America.

At first upon reading the convention made with the representative of the Government of Chili about arbitrations, I observed that this document was wanting in the approbation of both countries, and communicated the fact to you in my note of the 18th November ultimo, No. 12, wherein I notified the government of my intention to limit myself, for the moment, to sounding the President of the United States, Mr. Hayes, at the same time disclosing to him my opinion that perhaps it might be as well to reform the convention so as to have two or three chiefs of friendly nations instead of one only, from amongst whom, in case of necessity, an umpire might be selected.

After delivering the above-mentioned note, I held several conferences upon the subject with Mr. Evarts, who always manifested the best disposition on the part of his government to accept the honorable office of umpire, excepting only the case when the nature of its relations with any of the countries interested might not permit it to decide with the necessary impartiality due to a careful study of the point or points in dispute. At the same time he expressed the interest which his government would take in persuading the representatives of the South American republics to meet in Panama those of our republic. Of all these matters I gave due notice to the government in various official communications.

The sixth point says:

The Government of the United States being bound by a treaty still in force to maintain the neutrality of the State of Panama, and guarantee the integrity of the same, you will endeavor to find out what the Secretary of State understands by the term neutrality, and how far the said guarantee may be made to extend. This point might become of importance in case the Republic of Chili should claim indemnification from Colombia for the transport of arms across the Isthmus of Panama. This traffic, with but few exceptions, has been carried on by the agents of the Panama Railroad and other American citizens, the fact being that all the arms conveyed across the isthmus were for the use of the belligerents of the Pacific, besides being manufactured and sold by citizens of the United States.

The protocol of the 17th February ultimo will show how I complied with this clause of the instructions. Bearing in mind the complaints of Chili on account of the transport of arms across the Isthmus of Panama, it appeared to me that I ought to leave this point untouched, inasmuch as it would have placed us in an awkward situation with respect to the American Government, as the asking for such an avowal might be interpreted disadvantageously for us, if made precisely at a moment when our relations with the Government of Chili, either with or without reason, were not on the best footing.

It was consequently natural to await the discussion which had already been provoked relating to the opening of the canal, in order to examine that article of the instructions to which I am about to refer.

The seventh or last of the instructions given to me by the government is to the following effect:

(For this, vide II, page 378, ante.)

In the examination of this clause, which is the basis of the protocol of the 17th February, already submitted to the consideration of the citizen President of the Republic, I will endeavor to explain in detail all the circumstances that have occurred and the notes which have been exchanged in relation thereto, in order that the government may form a correct idea of what the United States hope to obtain from the legation in my charge, and what the latter got in turn from the cabinet of Washington. The project of the protocol drawn up by my predecessor, the illustrious Señor Don Justo Arosemena, which, according to the clause copied, ought to serve me as a guide for initiating the amplification of the treaty of 1846, still in force between the two countries, says as follows:

(Vide page 376, ante.)

After studying carefully the spirit of the preceding document, I solicited private interviews with the Secretary of State, for the purpose of discussing a plan convenient for both nations for extending the treaty of 1846, and after two or three conferences we agreed upon presenting in character of confidential, the bases we judged to be suitable for the desired amplification.

Upon the day appointed I went to the Department of State, and placed in the hands of Mr. Evarts the annexed project of treaty, the bases of which, with certain additions favorable to Colombia, are identical with those of the project of the Hon. Sr. Arosemena. I ought here to confess that without a full confidence in my own inspirations in regard to the fulfillment of my duty, it would have sufficed to determine me to accept the opinions of Dr. Arosemena the respect which I have always entertained for his competency and honor. The project says as follows:

(Vide page 361, ante.)

Two days afterwards Mr. Evarts submitted to my examination the "counter project," the true translation of which I copy, and to which, Mr. Secretary, I desire most particularly to direct your attention.

(Vide page 364, ante.)

From article 1 of the foregoing "counter project" the fact may be inferred that the American Government has at last determined to disclose its pretension to revise the concession made by Colombia in favor of Mr. Lucien N. B. Wyse, or any other enterprise having for its object the opening of an interoceanic canal through Colombian territory. This pretension I could not allow without humiliating the sovereignty of the nation I represented. For the purpose, therefore, of convincing the American Government that it was out of the question to hope that Colombia would consent to such an act of abdication, I addressed to him a note dated the 10th of February, of which I annex a copy.

General Santo Domingo to Mr. Evarts.

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA AT WASHINGTON,
Willard's Hotel, Washington, February 10, 1881.

SIR: The undersigned, minister of Colombia, has read and examined, with all the interest which the subject demands, the bases confidentially handed to him by his excellency the Secretary of State during their interview of yesterday for the discussion of the proposed amplification of the treaty of 1845, which is now in force between Colombia and the United States of America, which bases were proposed after his excellency read the draft which was likewise confidentially placed in his hands by the undersigned minister previously to his recent departure for New York.

As frankness and sincerity in its foreign relations are the unvarying guides of the government which he represents, the undersigned minister deems it likewise his duty to be governed by them; he will therefore proceed to state his opinions without reservation of any kind.

When the undersigned minister confidentially handed a statement of the views of the Government of Colombia, in the form of a draft of a treaty, to his excellency the Secretary of State, he referred solely, as is shown by the contents of said draft, to the manner in which the United States of America, as allies of Colombia, were to contribute to the fulfillment of the engagements contracted by said treaty; he did not even imagine that the enlightened American Government proposed to discuss the right of Colombia, as an independent and sovereign nation, to conclude conventions of the nature of that which she has concluded with Mr. Lucien N. B. Wyse for the construction of an interoceanic canal through her own territory.

Although the "whereases" of the draft presented to him are based upon the very obligations contracted by the Government of the United States of America in article 35 of the aforesaid treaty of 1846, that is to say, upon obligations designed to guarantee the sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus of Panama, article 1 of the draft prepared by his excellency the Secretary of State is, in the opinion of the undersigned, in direct derogation of the very sovereignty which it is proposed to guarantee, when it proposes to Colombia to agree that before granting a privilge similar to that which it has granted it needs to secure the consent and approval of a foreign power. Still more is this the case when, as in this instance, that proposition refers to a privilege already granted after all the formalities required by the institutions and laws of Colombia have been complied with, which having been done, the faith of the nation is solemnly pledged.

The undersigned minister has already had occasion to inform his excellency the Secretary of State that the Government of Colombia adheres, without reserve, to the Monroe doctrine; it does not think, however, that that doctrine can be enforced in the present case without disregarding the fraternal idea which constitutes its essence.

If his excellency thinks, therefore, that the idea contained in article 1 of the draft which he has been pleased to submit to the consideration of the undersigned is an indispensable preliminary on the part of the American Government to the discussion of the amplification of the treaty of 1846, which is now in force between Colombia and the United States of America, the undersigned minister is sorry to inform his excellency that without fresh instructions from his government he cannot accept that idea as a basis of discussion; and that as he is about to return to his country, his government may, when informed of the opinions of the enlightened government of which his excellency forms a part, give the proper authorization to its representative at this capital.

The undersigned minister desires this note to be considered as possessing the same confidential character as the interviews which he has had in relation to this matter, and he avails himself of this occasion to reiterate to his excellency the assurance of his high esteem and personal consideration.

R. STO. DOMINGO VILA.

The precise terms of my refusal to admit a discussion upon such bases undoubtedly decided the Secretary of State to propose that we should set aside the discussion of article 1, to which my former note referred, if, in my opinion and in accordance with terms of my note, the proposition should attack the sovereignty. At the same time he manifested his wish to discuss the articles following the counter-projects already mentioned.

In a confidential interview I endeavored in the first place to show clearly the contradictory tendencies of the project of the treaty presented by me and those of the counter-project which in his turn the Secretary of State had submitted to my consideration.

The following were my observations:

TENDENCIES OF THE PROJECT PRESENTED BY THE COLOMBIAN MINISTER.

1st. To admit that the excavation of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama might seriously augment the obligations contracted by the United States of America, in accordance with article 35 of the treaty of 1846, still in force between the two nations, and to manifest the willingness of Colombia to facilitate the fulfillment of the said obligations.

2d. To determine the limits of the territory embraced by the guarantee of sovereignty, and the neutrality of the interoceanic route.

3d. To define the facts and cases which might oblige the United States of America to join with Colombia to defend the territory guaranteed.

4th. To determine the facilities which Colombia might be disposed to afford to the United States to enable it to comply with the obligations it has undertaken, and, amongst others, that of the two governments mutually designating the places which require permanent or provisional fortifications. Those also that may be suitable for coal depots for the use of vessels of both nations. The occupation of any territory which may be menaced or invaded, so long as the emergency lasts, and the free transit of the canal by the American naval forces.

TEGDENCIES OF THE COUNTER-PROJECT PRESENTED BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

1st. Article 1 will completely annul the sovereignty of Colombia.

2d. Article 2 tends to modify article 6 of the convention Salgar-Wyse.

3d. Article 3 is based upon the idea of fortifying and occupying permanently the canal and its appurtenances by forces of the United States of America.

4th. Articles 4 and 5 point to a modification of article 5 of the convention Salgar-Wyse.

From the above comparison it may be clearly deduced that articles 2, 4, and 5 of the Secretary of State's project are affected with the same inconvenience as article 1, the discussion of which was set aside, because the undersigned did not feel himself authorized even to accept it as a basis of discussion.

With regard to article 3 of the Secretary of State's project, the undersigned takes the liberty of observing that if the fortification of the territory in question must be executed before the occurrence of the danger against which it may be desired to guard, he fails to see that the permanent occupation of the territory guaranteed by United States troops should be indispensable, because in case of necessity Colombia would maintain a sufficient armed force on the isthmus to defend the canal against a sudden attack, thereby giving time to the United States to come to her succor.

Being again urged by the Secretary of State to continue the discussion upon the basis of this counter project, which I had already definitively rejected, I wrote to him on the 11th February the following note:

General Santo Domingo to Mr. Evarts.

LEGATION OF COLOMBIA AT WASHINGTON,
Washington, February 11, 1881.

SIR: Although the time which is at the disposal of the undersigned minister in this capital is very short, he hastens to reply to the note of the Department of State bearing date of yesterday and referring to his of the same day.

The undersigned is sorry not to have succeeded in conveying to his excellency's mind the idea which he had in view when he dictated it, viz, that inasmuch as the draft which was submitted to his consideration is based upon its first article, and as the undersigned minister interprets it as not being in harmony with the sovereignty of the country which he represents, he has thought that, without fresh instructions from his government, he cannot continue the discussion touching so important and grave a matter, since the Government of Colombia could not foresee, when it gave him his instructions for his present mission, the possibility that, when the amplification of the treaty of 1846 should be considered, with a view to specifying the manner and providing the means for the fulfillment of the obligations contracted by the American Government in connection with the guarantee of the sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus of Panama, it should be sought, even remotely, to jeopardize, or even to call into question, its national sovereignty, as, in the opinion of the undersigned, it would be jeopardized if he were to accept as a basis of the discussion of a treaty anything similar to what is contained in article 1 of the draft prepared by his excellency, to which the undersigned now has reference.

Being without instructions, therefore, for this unforeseen case, and being obliged to return to Colombia with as little delay as possible, the undersigned will take occasion to inform his government, in person, of the views and wishes of the executive branch of the American Government, in relation to the treaty of 1846, which is now in force between Colombia and the United States of America, and to transmit it via the Isthmus of Panama.

In case, moreover, the American Government shall not think proper to authorize its minister at Bogotá to continue the negotiations there, the undersigned will, ere long, return to Washington; or, if not, another agent of the government of Colombia will soon be accredited; and the undersigned hopes that, when the discussion of this important question shall be reopened, the mutually advantageous result will be attained which is desired by both governments, and which the undersigned most sincerely regrets not to have been able, thus far, to bring about.

The undersigned will, nevertheless, be glad to visit the Department of State this afternoon at three o'clock, if his excellency the Secretary of State has no previous engagement, and he will be still more glad, on taking his leave for the time being, once more to hear the assurances of the fraternal feelings entertained by the great American nation towards its sisters on this continent.

The undersigned reiterates to his excellency the Secretary of State the assurances of his respect and consideration.

R. STO. DOMINGO VILA.

Having accepted the interview solicited at the end of the foregoing dispatch, I was again requested by the Secretary to delay my return to New York, with the hope, as he expressed it, that we might be able to arrive at an arrangement acceptable to both parties; but as the Secretary refused to fix the terms of the proposed arrangement, I informed him of my determination to go to New York with the intention of sailing in the steamer of the 18th instant.

The negotiation being in this state, and, as one may say, suspended, on the 15th February I received a telegram from Mr. Evarts informing me that he had sent Mr. Trescot, who, as representing the Department of State, was invested with power to continue the negotiation.

The discussion having been resumed in the manner explained, and finding the representative better inclined to recognize the justice of my rejection of the basis which had been proposed, I repeated the substance of my first project, and not having time to draw up a treaty, which might contain and develop them, I agreed to sign the protocol, of which

I have given an account, and which, as may be deduced from its context, is confined to making important declarations relating to the treaty, still in force, of the 12th of December, 1846, between Colombia and the United States of America.

After relating the condition of the negotiation, which has resulted in the protocol of the 17th of February of the present year, the original of which I have handed to the secretary of foreign affairs, I will now proceed to show the meaning that, in my opinion, should be attached to the declarations contained in the said protocol.

A mere perusal of the counter project presented by the Hon. Mr. Evarts will show the exact measure of the demands which are meditated against Colombia, and evident intention that exists of upsetting the organization of the company holding the concession made in favor of Mr. Lucien N. B. Wyse, through the humbug of a simulated superintendence by the American Government over all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus of Panama, in accordance with the views already proclaimed by the American press, which have also been advocated even in the chambers of the national representation.

In order to justify its designs the American Government has been compelled to invoke the Monroe doctrine, in spite of its being inapplicable to the case, and to interpret article 35 of the treaty of 1846, &c., as creating a right to interfere in matters which affect the sovereignty of Colombia. This article, so far from conceding to the United States the right claimed, imposes obligations upon that government which Colombia stipulated for as a compensation for the concessions made in the first part of the said article 35 to the United States.

Planting itself in this way upon a forced interpretation of article 35 of the treaty of 1846, before cited, the United States deny the right of Colombia to grant concessions of the kind made in favor of Mr. L. N. B. Wyse, without the previous approbation of the American Government.

It is necessary to study with attention the protocol of the 17th February, in order to discover whether or not the minister of Colombia induced the Cabinet of Washington to desist from such a pretension, and, in consequence, the perfect right of Colombia to make the law authorizing the excavation of a canal through her own territory.

After studying separately each of the points to which the protocol refers, and examining the terms and making the necessary comparison between that document and the treaty of 1846, basis of the aforesaid protocol, it will be admitted that the real object of the Colombian minister was to extract from the American Government two important declarations, calculated to include the recognition, as a fact legally consummated, of the contract Salgar-Wyse, and Colombia's right to seek from other powers a guarantee similar to that which the United States have bound themselves to make effective.

It will likewise be admitted that these declarations were obtained without any new concession of a definite character on the part of the representative of Colombia, i. e., none that were not contained in the treaty of 1846, and much less any that might be considered not included in the instructions which were delivered to him as a guide, and invested him with authority to sign the documents which it is now proposed to examine.

The first article of the protocol is confined to the recognition of the fact that by article 35 of the treaty of 1846, &c., all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus shall be free equally for the government and citizens of both nations, saving the exception provided for in the protocol, which is not in the treaty, of the case of war between the two nations.

Article 2 declares the consent of the two nations to be necessary for the erection of temporary or permanent works, and the establishment of convenient sites therefor. The same with respect to naval stations, dock-yards, and coal depots.

Besides the above, ulterior conventions will be required to arrange and attend to the maintenance of the aforesaid establishments.

Colombia, therefore, in the before-mentioned declaration has compromised herself to nothing, no time having been fixed for the construction of any defensive work in her territory, nor can any be constructed without her express consent, the occasion for conceding or denying not having occurred. In the mean time it is expressly stipulated in the said article 2 that until the danger provided for in article 35 of the treaty of 1846 shall become apparent no military force, except it belong to the army of Colombia, shall be stationed in the territory of the Isthmus.

Remembering the fact already proved that the Colombian minister decidedly and energetically refused all discussion upon the basis of conceding to the United States of America the right to modify the contract Salgar-Wyse, it will be comprehended that when he accepted in article 3 the concurrence of the American Government for fixing the tariff only in the case in which Colombia might consider herself justified in intervening in the regulations either dictated or which may be dictated..... by whom? by the company which owns the concession, it is proposed to compel the American Government to recognize this company, whose existing contract with Colombia was the obstacle which prevented it from considering itself at present possessed of the right to interfere with the regulations adopted.

This important recognition was obtained merely at the cost that Colombia should accept the concurrence of the United States for the execution of an act which will not take place, or for the exercise of a right that Colombia will not be able to recover, except in case of the expiration of the existing contract—a contract whose revision is claimed by the American Government.

The fourth article says:

No great effort of the imagination is required to discover that the intention of the Colombian minister in drafting that part of the article of the protocol just copied was to determine the possibility that by treaty other powers might also take part in guaranteeing the neutrality of the interoceanic route and the sovereignty of Colombia over its own territory, thereby inducing these powers to hasten the celebration of the said treaties with the bait of concessions made to the United States, this up to the present time having been the only nation that had offered her guarantee, and this same constituting the foundation of all the concessions hitherto granted.

It may consequently be deduced from the foregoing that article 4 was designed to secure for Colombia a collective guarantee from all the maritime powers, this being the only one that can satisfy the necessities of universal commerce, besides avoiding the conflicts that an isolated guarantee might maintain pending, like the sword of Damocles, not only over the sovereignty of Colombia, but also over the head of the entire commercial world.

In this manner I have analyzed each of the points contained in the protocol of the 17th of February, 1881, which it has been my fate to sign. In so doing I feel myself honored, in spite of having been informed that voices have been raised in terms of disapprobation both in and outside the Senate, even to the extent of denouncing my conduct as an act of treason towards the republic. Those persons who censure me in this way will not be the only ones whom I have been called upon to forgive. The hour of real danger for this country will be the proper time for branding the true traitors. May my accusers in my presence never have occasion to hang their heads with shame!

CONCLUSION.

The secretary for foreign affairs will permit me to repeat the opinion that from New York I urged upon the Government of Colombia the advantage of promoting actively amongst the maritime nations of the world the idea of a collective guarantee. According to my view, this measure is the only one calculated to secure effectively the rights and sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus, at the same time that it will maintain the neutrality of the interoceanic route, a matter in which the principles of universal commerce are interested.

It is to the obtainment of this collective guarantee that, in my humble opinion, the patriotic efforts of Colombia should be directed with all due caution, talent, tenacity, and constancy through her legations.

If the patriotic interest which I have dedicated to the discharge of the honorable mission that the Government of Colombia confided to me in the United States of America should eventually be recognized, together with my firm intention to adhere strictly to the tenor of the instructions delivered to me, and which served me as a guide during the negotiations of which I have just given a detailed account, I shall consider my labors fully recompensed.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

President Monroe in his message to Congress in 1823, after stating that friendly negotiations were in progress with Russia and England to clearly define the respective rights of these powers on the northeast coasts of America, expressed himself in the following terms:

"During the discussions that have taken place about the arrangement of this business it has been judged a proper occasion to affirm, as a principle of national interest, that the continent of America, in virtue of the liberty and independence that it has conquered, ought to be considered as free from all intention of future colonization on the part of European powers." *

* MEMORANDUM.—The above is a Colombian version of the Monroe doctrine, which, of course, does not exactly correspond with the language used by President Monore.

VI.

OFFICE OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Bogotá, May 28, 1881.

A communication having been made to the honorable Senate of the Union that the executive power, without declining to appreciate as patriotic and well intentioned the conduct of our minister in Washington, has declared the bases of the protocol of the 17th February to be inacceptable in a general point of view, and in consequence has given to the negotiations the turn corresponding to such decision.

This resolution ends for the present the important business to which the documents published this day refer.

Mr. Cramer to Mr. Evarts.

No. 624.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Copenhagen. March 2, 1881. (Received March 25.)

SIR: An interesting German work has recently come to my notice. Its title (translated) is: "North America: Its Cities and its Natural Wonders; its Scenery and its People." I consider the appearance of this work in Germany, and a translation thereof in the Swedish language, a hopeful sign of the times, as regards the dissemination in that country and in Scandinavia of just and correct views concerning the United States. For since my residence abroad I have noticed with pain that, with some noble exceptions, the secular press of Germany and, to some extent, of Scandinavia, has been unfriendly, not to say, hostile, towards our country. Three principal reasons may be assigned therefor:

First. The reflex influence of our republican institutions upon the people of those countries. The United States has demonstrated four things to the nations of the earth: 1. Its power to maintain itself as a nation while passing through the terrible ordeal of war; 2. Its capacity to assert and maintain itself as a first-class power without a large standing army; 3. Its great prosperity while following different principles of state-craft from those followed by European political "doctrinaires," 4. Its ability, without having recourse to heavy national taxation, not only to meet all its financial requirements, but also to reduce its national debt from $40,000,000 to $60,000,000 per annum, and that at a time when a number of European governments have to contend with an annual "deficit," notwithstanding the enormous taxes they have imposed upon their people. In spite of the press, the people of Germany and Scandinavia somehow get to know these things. It sets them to thinking. They naturally infer that civil and religious liberty—republican institutions—are highly favorable to individual and national prosperity. This creates in them a desire to emigrate to the United States. Many thousand of the thriftiest, most energetic, and intelligent Germans and Scandinavians have already found a home there, and many thousands more are annually flocking thither. What is Germany's and Scandinavia's loss is our gain. Nor is this all. Among those who are unable to emigrate from want of means republicanism is gaining ground, step by step, engendering dissatisfaction with large standing armies and consequent heavy taxes. Is it a wonder that under these circumstances the so-called conservative press of these countries becomes alarmed, assumes an unfriendly attitude toward our country, and publishes all kinds of bitter things against it, while the socialistic press denounces us because we are not radical or revolutionary enough in its eyes?

Secondly. The German press is unfriendly towards our country because our protective tariff prevents Germany from flooding our markets with its manufactured goods. Like its British colleague, the German (and to some extent the Scandinavian) press has heretofore denounced our tariff as a financial, commercial, and industrial heresy, while our country quietly, but energetically, attending to the development of its mineral, agricultural, industrial, and commercial resources, reached under this supposed heresy an unparalleled degree of prosperity. This fact has, however, opened their eyes, and a considerable number of German journals are now advocating the adoption of a similar tariff for Germany by pointing to the United States as a proof of its great success in securing a revenue, as well as in aiding the development of the industries of our country. They begin to learn from us, though with no friendly spirit, what we have long understood and practiced, viz, that a people cannot become prosperous by laws and police regulations, restricting individual liberty and enterprise; but that a commonwealth must always see its best riches in the number of its well-educated, healthy, and well-to-do citizens, in the number of its arms to work, brains to think, hearts to love the family and the country, and in opportunities for them to develop what is in them.

Thirdly. Second and third rate literati, unfit for any position in their own country; newspaper reporters unable to grasp large subjects and given only to chronicle gossip, and students having failed to pass the required examination in their respective professions, have not unfrequently emigrated to the United States, in the hope of rapidly making a splendid career. Having failed to do this also, they wrote gloomy letters to an already unfriendly press, denouncing the people and the country which, in the eyes of millions, are unexcelled by any other in the world. They failed from a lack of a proper knowledge of the English language, or of tact and practical common sense, or from their inability to adapt themselves to their new surroundings; but unwilling to admit their faults, they attribute their failure to our country and people, and many of the German papers are only too glad to print their diatribes against us.

But the times are changing. There are honest and honorable students, men of character and ability in the "Fatherland" who visit the United States to see things as they are, to learn our language, our manners and customs, our methods of work, our trade, commerce, and industries, in short, to thoroughly understand our country and people. Such a gentleman is the author of the work mentioned at the beginning of this dispatch (Mr. Ernst von Hesse-Wartegg). A "nobleman" by birth, and equipped with a thorough education, he traveled through and studied our country, using and enjoying every facility to become thoroughly acquainted with our people, their mode of life in cities, towns, and villages; with our schools, colleges, and universities; our agriculture, trade, and commerce; our natural scenery, wonders, and resources. The results of his extensive observations and studies are embodied in the stately volume referred to (822 pages and 300 illustrations). This work cannot fail to disseminate in Germany and the Scandinavian countries just and correct views concerning our country and our people.

The publisher of this work (Mr. Gustav Weigel, of Leipzic) is also publishing, in German, a "German Emigration Gazette," the design of which is to collect and disseminate just and correct information concerning the agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests of the United States, that is, just such information as is needed and wanted by those who desire to emigrate to our country.

These are hopeful signs of the times. They indicate a desire, on the part of the German and Scandinavian peoples, to become better acquainted with our country and our people, and to obtain reliable information of what is of universal interest in the western hemisphere. They also indicate that the future emigrants to the United States will belong to the intelligent, industrious, and well-to-do classes; a class of people that will find there ample room and opportunities to develop what is in them, as well as to assist in developing our immense resources; and thus contribute not only to their own wealth, but also to the wealth of the country.

Mr. Noyes to Mr. Evarts.

No. 406.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, November 12, 1880. (Received December 6.)

SIR: The Parliament met in extra session on Tuesday the 9th. The new ministry appeared with a declaration, which the prime minister, Mr. Jules Ferry, read in the Chamber, and Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, the minister of foreign affairs, in the Senate. In this document, which was looked for with eager expectation and of which I inclose a copy and translation, the ministry point out with much stress the fact that their action in vigorously enforcing the decrees of the 29th May, expelling the unauthorized congregations, was but obeying the majority of the Chamber, and appeal to that majority for a frank expression of confidence or the reverse. The delivery was interrupted a great deal in both Chambers, but, on the whole, was received favorably by the republican majority; yet, instantly afterward, the ministry were defeated upon the first motion, a mere question of the order of business, and immediately resigned.

Here was a curious embarrassment. The ministry were republican and had zealously endeavored to carry out the wishes of the majority, yet were outvoted at the first step. Who would be willing to take their places and face the changing moods of the Chamber if Mr. Gambetta refused to take power, and everybody knew that he would? The President declined to accept their resignations, and several conferences were held with the leaders of the republican groups, when it appeared that the vote was rather the result of a misunderstanding than a real difference, and it was agreed that the Chamber should give them a vote of confidence and they should continue the administration. This was done yesterday and the Jules Ferry ministry goes on.

This singular misunderstanding arose in this way: A bill is pending to change the tenure of office of the judges who, by the present law, are immovable and who are generally not in sympathy with the government and are unwilling to carry out its measures. Another bill of great importance providing a system of primary education, as well as bills ameliorating the law of the press and of public meetings, are also awaiting action. Mr. Ferry asked to have the education bill put at the head of the list and proceeded with first. Many members of decided republicanism, while not opposing the education bill, were eager to get at the magistracy bill at once in order to reach the insubordinate judges immediately. Others of the advanced left were glad of any chance to give a blow to the ministry. The whole of the right of all shades is always ready to vote against the government. When Mr. Ferry therefore made this mere motion on the order of business, a ministerial measure, and insisted upon it, the extreme left and the right for once voted together, defeating him by 200 against 166, and placing the magistracy bill first. These 200 votes were made up of 33 of the extreme left, 5 pure left, who think the ministry go too slow, 4 of the left center, who think they go too fast, and 43 Bonapartists and 38 royalists, who oppose the government on everything. These last 81 reactionaries decided the vote, which was not the real expression of the republican majority; many abstained from voting.

By the new arrangement, giving the ministry a vote of confidence and continuing them in office, there is apparent harmony, but the want of cohesion in the majority which has just expressed confidence in the government is evident, and the confidence is not wholly without reserve. They still did not let Mr. Ferry put the educational bill first, but kept the magistracy bill in its place, and will proceed first to discuss and dispose of it. Meantime the present ministry will be the apparent governing power in France, though the influence and will of Mr. Gambetta really control political movements. He will not take possession nominally, and so long as the real and the ostensible power are wielded by different hands, it is hardly to be expected that there will be a vigorous and stable ministry. On the other hand, it is reassuring to know that the changes that have recently taken place and those that may occur are not radical changes of principle or policy, but differences in degree of opinion among sincere republicans, and that the republic continues, steadily gaining in strength with time, and the people of France, contented with their political institutions and busily engaged in their affairs, are prosperous, peaceful, and happy.

I have, &c.,

EDWARD F. NOYES.

[Inclosure in No. 406.]

Ministerial declaration.

The change of ministry effected during your recess is not one of those modifying the general direction of public affairs. The policy we submit to you is not new to you. You yourselves inspired it. We have remained faithful to the line of conduct clearly issuing from the debates of last session in both chambers. We have not deemed it possible to suspend the exercise of the laws on account of the difficulties and resistance excited by their application, nor held it necessary to ask of Parliament a change in legislation.

The laws regulating in France the condition of religious communities are not laws of haphazard or violence. They are laws of wisdom, necessity, and tradition. They form part of that collection of guarantees established by the foresight of our forerunners for the defense of civil society, and of the rights of the state—guarantees which the republican government cannot any more than any other dispense with, and which it would be supremely imprudent to disdain or weaken. These laws are fundamental ones. They are found in all times and countries. They infringe neither dogma nor conscience. To deny them is to deny the state. Yet such is the spectacle we are witnessing. Impelled by passions more political than religious, and with the significant co-operation of parties whom the country has rejected, a certain number of irregularly established communities have ostentatiously organized rebellion against the laws.

It behooved us to put an end by general measures to a situation injurious to the public peace. Two hundred and sixty-one unrecognized establishments have been dispersed. The dissolution has extended to all the male communities devoid of legal status. It has been effected by administrative methods, as is the acknowledged right of the government whenever the modes of execution are effective or practicable. We have no intention of applying them to the female communities. Their position will be settled by another procedure. You may leave the charge of that to the government, which will have received your confidence, and you will calmly enter on your parliamentary work.

We are now at a decisive moment. The legislature, elected on the 14th of October, 1877, has just entered on its last year of existence. It must be anxious to go to the country, not with labors sketched out, the variety and abundance of which testify only our good will, but with legislative works completed, and, even though small in number, with solutions arrived at.

In the first rank of bills which may and should before all others receive the sanction of the two chambers, you will certainly place those respecting education. This is the direction in which the present legislature has most strongly marked its resolutions and tendencies. You have not only with incomparable generosity endowed public education of all grades, but you have also—and this will be one of your claims before history—resolutely undertaken to restore to the republican state its essential rights and responsibilities as regards education. Thanks to you, we are reascending the incline so imprudently descended for thirty years. The law on the conferring of degrees and the law on supreme educational councils, already passed by both chambers; the bills on letters of obedience and on girls' secondary education, which will soon obtain the adhesion of the Senate; bills which will insure the religious neutrality of the elementary public schools, as also compulsion and gratuitousness; lastly, a bill which we have prepared and which may be speedily passed for requiring from non-state establishments of secondary education substantial guarantees of the fitness of their degrees and for strengthening therein the supervision of the state—all these measures are bound up together; they are looked for by public opinion, so anxious among us for everything affecting the enlightenment of men's minds and the moral unity of the fatherland.

Besides education bills, last session bequeathed us a bill respecting the magistracy. An agreement was effected on the chief points between the cabinet we have succeeded and the committee to whom the subject was referred. Our intention is to abide by that agreement. The composition of the judicial staff is a vital question for every government which is being founded. Directly or indirectly all new powers for a century past have taken guarantees in this respect. The republic cannot escape the common rule. It is unavoidable that measures of this kind should affect things to be supremely respected; but when those measures are temporary, moderate, and equitable, when they may put an end to a troublous situation, good neither for justice nor for the executive, it is a work of wisdom to accept them.

There are other bills that are urgent. Two fundamental measures are pending before the chambers—the public meetings bill and the new press laws. You will deem it a matter of honor to bring them to a fitting consummation. You owe it to liberty; we ask for it in the name of government. We enforce the laws in the broadest spirit, but we shall never agree under the republic to a legal interregnum. So long as the system of preliminary authorization subsists the government will have responsibilities from which we shall not shrink. Nor do we think that Parliament is more ready than we are to put up with a system which would leave the government disarmed or indifferent in regard to provocations to crime or civil war. This paradoxical impunity is revolting to our public manners, and public opinion is apt to desert governments that do not defend themselves. Must we insert in the programme of the year now commencing a general bill on public meetings? We think that neither the time remaining to us nor the state of people's minds affords hope of seeking in the two chambers with any success the solution of a problem so difficult and so complex. We have only taken one chapter from it, on which agreement seems easy. A bill on professional associations and syndicates will simply legalize an already old state of things, and put into the hands of the industrious democracy an instrument of free initiative and of social progress of considerable importance.

We need not remind you that the general customs tariff bill has now only to be examined and voted by the senate, and that it is in the highest degree important to the public prosperity that the economic situation of France in regard to her neighbors should be settled by well-considered treaties before the conclusion of the present legislature.

As to public works, all the main laws are passed, and the grand plans of M. de Freycinet are being resolutely carried into execution. We shall complete them by important measures relating to the improvement of national roads, to agricultural improvements, and more especially to that which will hasten the construction of the canal derived from the waters of the Rhone, so much desired by the south of France, so necessary to the most sorely tried regions of our country.

Lastly, our military organization requires to be completed by a bill concerning the administration, so long under consideration in Parliament, and by a bill on the promotion of army and navy officers, which is impatiently awaited by the army and navy. The ministers of war and marine will add new clauses to it relating to the re-engagement of non-commissioned officers. These dispositions respond to imperative wants, and are, like the promotion bill, highly urgent. Lastly, the unification of the tariffs of pay has been studied so as to introduce substantial improvements in the situation of the privates and the non-commissioned officers.

The government will communicate to Parliament the diplomatic documents relative to the negotiations which have followed the signature of the treaty of Berlin, and especially those referring to the most recent incidents in Oriental affairs. You will therein find evidence of our good relations with all the powers, of the peaceful spirit animating them all, and of the constant efforts of the European concert to prevent new collisions. As to the Montenegrin question, notwithstanding delays and hesitations, we are persuaded that the will of the great powers will in the end prevail. The maintenance of common deliberations is the surest guarantee of the tranquillity of Europe. The government of the republic has never ceased to act in a spirit of disinterestedness and peace, which nobody abroad doubts, and which has won for republican France the esteem and confidence of the world.

We have told you how we look upon the task of our last year. That programme does not resemble certainly those ambitious and high-sounding manifestoes which touch everything without solving anything, and in which the detractors of the present majority are glad to cloak their powerlessness. But we have as our judge a serious and prudent nation, which for ten years has seen the policy of realities at work, and is not ready to desert it. To carry out so many useful objects two things are necessary—method and the spirit of continuity; method to defend the general order of our work from the multiplicity of individual propositions and the invasion of sterile debates; the spirit of continuity to give to the parliamentary situation that stability without which there can be neither enduring work nor a fruitful session. The ministry which you accept must enjoy your entire confidence. The understanding between the majority and the cabinet which is about to preside over its labors must be complete. As to ourselves we cannot be content with an apparent confidence and uncertain approbation. You know who we are and whither we shall go. We do not wish the majority to tolerate us. We ask it to give us, or resolutely to refuse us, its cooperation.

No. 430.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, February 4, 1881. (Received February 21.)

SIR: The debate which took place yesterday in the Chamber of Deputies, closing with a declaration from Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, the minister of foreign affairs, will do much to quiet the uneasiness lately prevailing here and throughout Europe in apprehension of war growing out of the Greco-Turkish question, and the fear which within a few days has been entertained of a change in the French cabinet and policy by the retirement of Mr. St. Hilaire.

The position of France during and ever since the Berlin conference has been friendly to Greece, so much so that Mr. Waddington, her representative in that conference, was called a philhellene. Mr. St.

Hilaire, too, whose reputation as an author and philosopher rests upon studies in Greek literature, has been considered a friend of Greece, until, of late, the publication of his circular of instructions to the French diplomatic representatives showed a reserve on the part of France and a more severe disposition in regard to the explosive policy of the little kingdom. This publication was viewed, however, by the diplomatic world with satisfaction as tending to preserve peace by restraining the bellicose Greeks.

But a few days since articles began to appear in the Republique Française, which is looked upon by many as Mr. Gambetta's organ, criticizing Mr. St. Hilaire's policy in such sharp terms that it was interpreted to mean that Mr. Gambetta had determined on a change in the cabinet, and that Mr. St. Hilaire should go out. When Mr. Proust, the near friend of Mr. Gambetta, gave notice that he should question the ministry on the foreign policy on Thursday, it drew universal attention to the discussion; and when the day arrived—yesterday—the diplomatic tribune was crowded to its utmost capacity by my colleagues, who watched the development of the debate with deep interest.

Mr. Proust's speech was not in a hostile spirit. He desired not so much to have categorical answers to questions as a free exchange of views and a perfect understanding of the situation. His review of the historical precedents and of the circumstances surrounding the Eastern question was listened to with impatience. Mr. Lamy, an accomplished young member of the Left Center, spoke forcibly in support of Mr. St. Hilaire's policy as far as disclosed in the correspondence published.

Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, whose appearance at the tribune was awaited with eagerness, was received and listened to with profound attention and respect. His speech was clear, full, and decisively marked out the policy of France, as a member of the European concert, in favor of peace, and in disapproval of the bellicose demonstrations of Greece.

He refuted the misinterpretations which had been given in many quarters to the character of the Berlin conference, reviewed the action and policy of Mr. Waddington, and his successor, Mr. de Freycinet—friendly to Greece, but seeking always to preserve the peace of Europe.

As to the present attitude of the Greeks he said:

> They are friends whom I would be glad to declare were in the right, but whom I am compelled, in the name of truth, of the interests of France, of Europe, and of Greece herself, reluctantly to say are in the wrong.

He pointed out that no one was attacking or proposed to attack Greece, who coveted territory which a neighbor had held for centuries; that the territory demanded was not that ceded by Turkey in the treaty of San Stefano, and which the conference at Berlin undertook to divide and regulate in a way to satisfy the various populations and interests; that negotiations are in progress to settle the whole question by arbitration, and there must be patience for a little instead of rushing upon war, with all the disasters that will come and will fall first of all upon Greece herself; that France had been so sincere a friend to Greece in the past that she had the right to give her counsel now, and to have that counsel heeded. He said:

> We have given advice to the Greeks, but so far, they have not listened. I remember that eleven years ago advice was given to our government to prevent its undertaking a war which was most disastrous, and from which this country still suffers. That advice was not heeded, but it was wise counsel. Do not reproach us now if we are not listened to by the Greeks. We urge, Europe unanimously advises her to cease her armaments, which are compromising and ruining her, and to trust to the good will and the justice of Europe, which she ought not to doubt. To-day peace exists; all Europe desires that it shall continue; only Greece wishes to kindle war.

All sides of the House, even to the Extreme Right, were gradually gained by him as he proceeded with increasing plaudits, and when he closed the House passed, by a unanimous vote, an order of the day approving his declaration, a real triumph for Mr. St. Hilaire, and an assurance of the strength of the ministry and the concord of the Republican leaders.

The tone of the debate, and its happy close, showed, to the gratification of those who watched, that there was no such breach as had been supposed between Mr. Gambetta and the ministry, and it gave an assurance of peace that every one welcomed.

In the evening, at the reception given by President Grévy at the Elysee Palace, which was thronged by almost all the notabilities of Paris, I conversed with several of my colleagues, including Lord Lyons, Prince Hohenlohe, and Count Beust, who expressed their satisfaction at the situation and confidence that the complications which have of late obscured the outlook and threatened a European war would pass by, and the general peace be preserved.

Have to-day sent dispatch to minister for foreign affairs expressing profound regrets of my government that the Government of France has seen fit to promulgate a decree forbidding importation of American pork.

Have called attention to the fact that this decree is far reaching, and the most detrimental to the commercial interests of my country, and have asked for a revocation of the order. Requested statement of cir-

No. 439.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, February 26, 1881. (Received March 12.)

SIR: Referring to the telegraphic correspondence, which has passed between the State Department and this legation, upon the subject of a decree of the French Government prohibiting the importation into France of American pork, I have the honor to inclose herewith—

1. The report of Mr. Tirard, minister of agriculture and commerce, and the decree of the President in French.

2. Translation of the report and decree.

3. Copies of telegrams from and to State Department on the subject.

4. Copies of my dispatches to the minister for foreign affairs of the French Republic.

In addition to the information communicated by these documents, I have the honor to report that immediately upon the promulgation of the decree, February 19, 1881, I took measures to acquaint myself with the facts and circumstances which led to this summary action, more fully, if possible, than appeared in the report of Mr. Tirard.

On Sunday morning, the 20th instant, I received your telegram, and the same day, addressed to the minister for foreign affairs, the communication expressing, by your authority, the regrets of my government. On Monday, the 21st, and Tuesday, the 22d, I had interviews with Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, and on Wednesday, the 23d, by appointment, with Mr. Tirard, minister of agriculture and commerce, I was informed by both these ministers, that the necessity for the decree was found in the fact that numerous inspections of American pork had recently been made by most competent scientific men; that the meat was taken at a random, from many different packages, or consignments, and that all, or nearly all, was found to be infected with trichinæ; that in the estimation of the Government of the French Republic, the preservation of life and health was a matter more important and imperative than any consideration of trade and commerce; that the resolution of the government had only been taken after full investigation, mature reflection, and great pressure of public opinion; that the decree, while it undoubtedly affected injuriously American commerce, was not less severe and appreciable to the French traders and population, as American pork entered largely into the daily consumption of a great number of the poorer classes of Frenchmen; that the maintenance of the decree would depend upon the necessity, and that it would be revoked as soon as the occasion for it had disappeared, or had become so rare as to warrant its recall.

I assured the ministers referred to that I was incapable of urging or suggestiug any action on the part of the French Government, which would imperil life, or the public health; that I fully appreciated all which had been said upon that subject; but I ventured to suggest, that among fifteen millions of my countrymen very little meat was consumed, other than American pork; that among that great number of persons this constituted a part of their daily food; that among thirty-five millions more of our population pork was eaten interchangeably with other meats, and that no danger to life or health had resulted from such consumption and use. I also cited England, where a vast amont of American pork is used, and where no disastrous effects have followed. I represented that it was inconceivable to my government, that different and dangerous consequences could follow its consumption in France. I corrected the statement contained in the report of Mr. Tirard, as to the prohibition of importation of such meats into Germany, Austria, and Spain, on the authority of our ministers in those countries. I represented the magnitude of the interest involved; the disastrous consequences which would follow the continued operation of the decree, and in the name of my government asked for its revocation, or suspension, until such time as the subject could receive a fuller and more searching investigation.

I inquired if any actual cases of sickness or death, resulting from the use of American pork in France had been officially reported. I was answered that while no certain case could be cited, there were numerous cases where it was believed, or suspected, to have been influential in producing said results. I said that I would venture to affirm that no case could be found, in France or elsewhere, in which death or illness had resulted from the use of American pork well cooked, even if infected as claimed. I also said that this disease was not confined to American pork, but was far more common in France and Germany, by reason of the inferior and less healthful substances upon which the hogs of those countries were fed and fattened.

I called attention to the fact that this decree had been published without notice, and that it became immediately operative; that American pork, to the value of many millions of francs, had arrived in France, and was awaiting delivery, or was on the sea in transitu; that bills on account of payment for these consignments had been drawn and discounted, and that these drafts would be continually arriving in Paris, would be protested and would cause financial ruin to many who had acted in good faith, and who had made their shipments without notice of this decree, or the facts upon which it purports to be based.

The minister of agriculture and commerce finally assured me that all pork which had been shipped from America prior to the publication of the decree, should be admitted into French ports, and delivered to consignees, subject only to inspection, and the condemnation of such meat as might be found diseased. He also informed me that the government would diligently seek for expedients, in order to be able to abrogate the decree, without putting in jeopardy life and health.

In my interviews with both these ministers, I found them not unkindly disposed, and their assurances were frank and conciliatory. While no promise was made by either, the impression I gained was, that at no distant day, the decree would be revoked, and some thorough system of inspection substituted therefor. To this end I have utilized all possible influences, and shall continue to do so. I hope for favorable results.

I have, &c.,

EDWARD F. NOYES.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 439.—Translation.]

Report to the President of the French Republic.

My attention has recently been called to the introduction into France, of large quantities of salted pork; meat (viandes de porc salées) imported from America. These meats are infected with trichinæ, and might endanger to a great extent public health.

The board of health (comité d'hygiene publique) of France, to which I have referred the matter, was unanimous in declaring that trichinæ introduced alive into the digestive organs of man communicated the malady, known as trichinosis, a disease, the terrible effects of which produces in nearly all cases death. In presence of so positive an affirmation, the government should take, without delay, proper measures to avoid the danger to which the population would be exposed by using the meats already introduced into France and delivered for consumption. I have therefore addressed a circular to the prefects, prescribing the indispensable culinary precautions to be taken, in order to destroy the pernicious effects of the trichinæ with which the pork coming from America, is infected. The largest publicity has been given by the prefects to this circular, which was also inserted in the Journal Officiél of the republic.

But the measures indicated, infallible, if strictly applied, have not seemed to me to afford a sufficient guarantee to the consumers of these meats, who belong mainly to the poorer classes of the population, against the risks they may incur, by neglecting or ignoring the precautions prescribed. I have concluded to combat the principle of the evil, and I have charged the committee of public hygiene to report by what practical means it would be possible to detect the presence of trichinæ in the salted pork before delivering it for consumption.

This inspection to be efficient should be made by competent men in a limited number of ports of entry, and in custom-houses of the frontier, specially designated for the introduction into France of pork meat coming from abroad.

It has been established that the introduction of these meats through the single port of Havre, where importation, it is true, the largest amount to not less than 29,000,000 or 30,000,000 kilograms per year, that is to say, an average of 2,500 tons per month. The inspection, by microscope, of meats thus imported, would require for every operation, a time relatively long, and such that it would not be possible to analyze accurately such considerable quantities, whatever might be the number of persons employed. The control therefore would necessarily be partial, and consequently inefficient and would give to the public a deceiving security which would embarrass the action of the government. I was therefore compelled to give up any scheme of inspection of imported pork meat, at least for the present.

Still, it is important to put an end to the real and permanent danger to which public health is liable by the introduction into France of meats notoriously infected with trichinæ. An efficient supervision seeming impossible, I consider it indispensable to interdict, without delay, on the whole border line of the republic, the importation of salted pork meats coming from the United States of America. Such a measure has already been taken by many states of Europe; in Russia, in Italy, in Austria, in Spain, in Portugal, and in Greece pork meats of this origin are no more admitted.

However, considering that pork meats of American origin enter largely into the alimentations of the poorer classes, I will continue to study the means of resolving the difficulties of this important question, giving at the same time to the consumers of these meats the guarantees they have the right to expect from a vigilant government.

Please receive, Mr. President, the homage of my respectful devotedness.

The minister of agriculture and commerce.

P. TIRARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, February 20, 1881.

SIR: I am instructed by Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, at Washington, to convey to your excellency an expression of the profound regret entertained by the Government of the United States, that your excellency's government should have deemed it advisable to issue the decree of the 18th instant prohibiting the importation of American pork into France.

I need not remind your excellency that the influence of such a decree is far reaching and most detrimental to the commercial interests of the United States. Speaking in the name of my government, I beg leave to express the hope that further consideration, and a fuller investigation of the facts which led to the decree, may result in its revocation.

In the mean time I beg to be informed as to the circumstances which have induced your excellency's government to adopt the extreme measure set forth in the decree, in order that I may promptly make known the facts to my government.

I take this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

EDWARD F. NOYES.

[Inclosure 4 in No. 439.]

Mr. Noyes to M. Barthelémy St. Hilaire.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, February 22, 1881.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of this morning, regarding the decree of your excellency's government, prohibiting the importation into France of American pork, I beg leave to submit, for such consideration as your excellency may deem them entitled to, the following observations:

The preparation and sale of pork constitute one of the most important industries of the United States, and a vast amount of capital is invested in the same. The maintenance for any considerable time of the decree in question would result in the financial ruin of thousands of our business men. Pork, to the value of many millions of francs, is now afloat, on its way to France, or has already arrived, and is waiting delivery. Bills for payment on account of these consignments have been drawn and discounted, and the drafts will inevitably go to protest in Paris if this decree remains in force. I trust, therefore, that it will not be considered strange that my government and countrymen entertain a deep feeling on this subject.

The decree was issued without notice, and became immediately operative. Therefore, there was no opportunity afforded to provide against the immediate disastrous effects and loss occasioned thereby.

I appreciate fully the considerations regarding the public health, referred to by your excellency in our interview of to-day, and should be loth to urge or suggest any action which would imperil either life or health. But I respectfully suggest that in the United States there are probably fifteen million persons who consume daily American pork, to the exclusion of all other kinds of meat. Thirty-five million more habitually partake of pork, interchangeably with other kinds of meat. No disastrous consequences have followed, and neither life nor health has been endangered. Under such circumstances, and with such unlimited means of knowledge, it seems to my government and people inconceivable that the infection or disease complained of, and which purports to form the basis of the decree, can be so general or extensive as to warrant the summary measure adopted by the French Government; and I respectfully suggest that the disease complained of is not confined to American pork, but is quite as common to that of France and other countries. In American pork it is certainly exceptional, and comparatively rare, as a long and extensive experience has assured my government and countrymen.

Considering, therefore, the interests involved, and the facts to which I have alluded, I beg leave to express the hope that the decision arrived at by your excellency's government may not be considered final and irrevocable, but that the decree may be at least so modified as to admit American pork into French ports subject to rigid inspection and condemnation of such, if any, as may be found diseased.

My government very respectfully, but most urgently, protests against the decree, as now in force, and urges a reconsideration of the subject, with a view to the revocation of the order and the adoption of some other expedient not injurious to American trade and commerce, and not incompatible with the welfare of the French people.

I beg to be informed, in as much detail as is convenient, as to the extent of the inspection of American pork, upon which the order was based, the relative amount of such meat found to be defective, and as to whether any actual cases of sickness or death in France, resulting from the use of American pork, have been officially reported.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew the assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

EDWARD F. NOYES.

No. 337.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 2, 1881.

SIR: Inclosed is an autograph letter from the President to President Grévy, with an office copy thereof, tendering the invitation of the Government and people of the United States to the Government and people of France to participate in the centennial celebration of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.

I also inclose a letter, with copy for your files, addressed by me to M. Oscar de Lafayette, through whom, as a prominent representative of the family of General Lafayette, a like invitation is extended to that family.

These invitations are tendered in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress of February 18 ultimo, copies of which I transmit herewith.

You will deliver the President's letter to the President of the French Republic, and will ask an audience for that purpose. In leaving to you the choice of the language to be employed in communicating this invitation to the President of the Republic, as also that to the family of General Lafayette, I trust to you to appropriately and simply express the feelings which prompt the American people to this act of grateful friendship, and the hope of the President that the invitation will be accepted.

It is too early as yet to foresee what arrangements will need to be made for the reception of the distinguished visitors. I am, however, directed by the President to say that the visitors who may represent the French Republic at this commemorative celebration, as well as the members of the Lafayette family who may come as private citizens, will be entertained as the guests of the American Government and people.

If the invitation be accepted, you will briefly telegraph the fact and date of acceptance.

I am, &c.,

WM. M. EVARTS.

President Hayes to President Grévy.

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: I have the honor to inform you that the Congress of the United States have adopted a joint resolution authorizing and requesting me to extend to the government and people of France a cordial invitation to unite with the government and people of the United States on the 19th day of October, 1881, in a fit and appropriate observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.

It becomes therefore my agreeable duty to hasten, in the name of the government and people of the United States, to tender this invitation to the government and people of France. Our friendship with France, formed during the war of our revolution, rendered glorious by feats of arms performed by soldiers of the two nations on the same victorious fields, confirmed by a hundred years of peace, and now happily strengthened by our common enjoyment of popular institutions of government, has always been highly valued and cherished by the American people. I trust that the celebration of the hundredth anniversary of a victory which consecrated the early union of our arms may serve to draw still closer the bonds of fraternal regard and amity between the two republics.

I embrace this opportunity to repeat the assurances of my fervent desire for the prosperity and happiness of yourself and of the great republic over which you have so fortunately been called upon to preside.

Written at Washington this 2d day of March, 1881.

Your good friend,

R. B. HAYES.

SIR: Rarely has a more agreeable duty devolved upon me than that which I now fulfill in transmitting, through you, to the family of General Lafayette the cordial invitation which, by a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, is tendered to them to unite with the government and people of the United States, on the 19th day of October next, in a fit and appropriate observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.

To this expression of the national will, and the fervent gratitude of the people of this country for the noble and fraternal aid they received from the truest and best blood of France, in their memorable struggle for freedom, no words of mine can add emphasis to the sentiments of reverence for the memory of Lafayette, and affection for his descendants, which have ever animated and always will animate the people of the United States.

I have instructed the minister of the United States at Paris to convey this invitation to you in a fitting manner, and to say that the members of this illustrious family who may do us the favor to visit our country upon this commemorative celebration will be welcomed as the guests of the nation.

No. 342.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 15, 1881.

SIR: Your No. 439, relating your action with respect to the late decree of the French Government prohibiting the importation of American pork into France, has been received. I have pleasure in approving your course, and I trust that your discreet and conciliatory efforts towards procuring such modification of the enforcement of the decree as will relieve legitimate commerce from a sudden and disastrous check may be successful.

The publication in the London Times on the 19th of February ultimo, of a report made in December last, by the then acting British consul at Philadelphia, has occasioned wide spread alarm, and given rise to correspondence with the British legation here, and with the boards of trade of the great pork producing and shipping centers. Mr. Crump's report, besides stating that "immense mortality among swine by a disease known as hog cholera" exists (from which disease 700,000 head are stated to have died in Illinois during the past year), proceeds to confound that disease with the entirely distinct disorder of trichinosis, of which latter he relates certain horrible examples.

The most searching investigation fails to show the basis of these published statements. While the mortality among very young swine from the so-called hog cholera has been less than for several years past, the health of the full-grown hogs (which are alone packed as pork) has never been better in the great producing States, and the absence of communicable diseases among them has been most noteworthy.

In view of all the facts accessible to it, this Department cannot but reach the conviction that the good faith of the British representative at Philadelphia has been imposed upon by designing speculators to the great injury of legitimate trade.

My predecessor sent you a telegram on the 7th instant in the following words:

NOYES, Minister, Paris:

Published statements of mortality among swine are false.

EVARTS.

Since that date, my correspondence with the British legation here has not elicited any ground for the extraordinary report of Mr. Crump. You may therefore unhesitatingly deny it, in view of the mass of direct testimony to the contrary possessed by this government, in case the French minister should appeal to it as justifying interdiction of, or onerous interference with, the pork trade of this country.

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1881.

Your course respecting pork decree of French Government approved. Statements of Crump, acting British consul at Philadelphia, have occasioned excitement and widespread comment here, leading to correspondence with British legation and boards of trade.

Hog cholera is confounded with trichinosis, which is an entirely distinct disease. But representations regarding hog cholera are very greatly exaggerated. Most searching investigation fails to show the basis for published statements. The mortality among very young swine from cholera has been less this year than for several years past, and the condition of full-grown hogs, which are alone used for packing and export, is this year exceptionally good. British representative at Philadelphia has apparently been misled by designing speculators to great injury of legitimate trade.

Deny in strongest terms report of British consul, should French ministers appeal to it as justifying them in interdicting or restricting American pork trade.

Instructions follow.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose copies of telegrams regarding the decree prohibiting the importation of American pork, sent and received since the date of my dispatch No. 439, of date February 26, 1881.

The French Government has consented to receive, and to deliver to consignees, subject to inspection and condemnation of such as is found to be diseased, all pork which had actually been shipped from its original starting point by packers and merchants prior to the date of the decree of prohibition. Positive proof, however, will be required that the meats were actually in transitu before the decree was promulgated.

I have sent copies of your telegrams on this subject to Mr. Lowell, United States minister at London, as you directed.

The inspection of American pork here has demonstrated that a considerable percentage, just how large cannot be ascertained, as reports are conflicting, is infected with trichinæ, and the prejudice among Frenchmen against it so great that sales by retail dealers are largely suspended. Some dealers inform me that they cannot dispose of American pork and hams at any price. But as the price of French pork has greatly advanced since the decree of prohibition was promulgated, it is not likely the present state of things will continue. The French people of the poorer classes must have American pork, and in time the decree will, I am confident, be revoked, but I do not expect it at present.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I was, on Monday, the 21st day of the present month, admitted to a private audience with the President of the French Republic, and that I delivered to him the autograph letter of the President of the United States inviting the French Government and people to unite with the Government and people of the United States in a commemorative celebration of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.

President Grévy received the letter very graciously, and said:

I receive with pleasure the invitation of which you are the bearer, and I thank the Government of the United States for having thought of extending it to us.

As in the great undertaking of securing American independence France, it is true, had some trouble, she will take her share of the joy which the celebration of the centennial of the achievement of that undertaking will bring.

During the hundred years which have elapsed since the heroic feat which the contemplated centennial will commemorate the United States have developed themselves marvelously. France has been the sympathetic witness of that prosperity, and her government will be happy to accept the invitation extended to it and the nation.

The interview was altogether informal, and my part in it was very brief and simple, as seemed to me befitting the occasion.

The President was very cordial, and was evidently very much pleased with the invitation.

I also sent to Mr. Oscar de Lafayette, with a brief note of transmittal, the invitation for him and other members of the Lafayette family. He is very ill at the present time, and sent me word by a member of his family that he would transmit to me, as soon as possible, a formal acknowledgment of the exceedingly kind, thoughtful, and polite invitation of my government.

SIR: Only a few days since I took great pleasure in forwarding to Mr. Oscar de Lafayette the invitation for him and his family to take part in the celebration of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown. He was then seriously, but not supposed to be dangerously, ill. To-day, as one of the pall-bearers, I followed him to his grave. His death was sudden and unexpected.

M. de Lafayette and his family were deeply touched by the invitation of our government, and all expressed to me their profound gratitude. I take a mournful satisfaction in the fact that the invitation reached M. de Lafayette before his death, and while he was still conscious.

I sent from this legation a beautiful wreath, to be placed upon the coffin.

The funeral mass was attended by an immense concourse of people, and by a great number of the dignitaries of the state, and the service was a most impressive one.

DEAR SIR: It has been suggested to us that we advise you of the course pursued in Paris with our meats, and to offer letters.

We send copy of one entire, with comments below.

In contrast with it, where our hams passed "with honor," another house, with hams packed the same day here and forwarded by same steamer, were rejected in Paris, and lot sent back to Havre. This, too, after passing inspection at Havre.

[Letter from Havre.]

Lot per "Volner" found sound by the government inspector, and, with authority of consignees, forwarded to Paris. (Second lot.) But they may be rejected at Paris like the first. Here they do not find trichina, but it appears they find some in Paris, and then immediately destroy the meat.

Mr. P. returned us here nine crates (from Paris). We will try and sell the hams; but it is a pity to see how these hams are damaged; the covers are off, and they have holes as big as a thumb.

PARIS, March 4, 1881.

S D., JR., & CO., Cincinnati:

Your invoice of January 22 reached me to-day, after passing the ordeal of microscopical examination with honors.

The delay and trouble and consequent expenses are so great that I can hardly say whether I am glad or sorry that the invoice of January 4 has at last reached Havre. * * * Many persons are, of course, prejudiced against American pork. This was, no doubt, the only object of the recent decree.

I hear that some members of Bordeaux chamber of commerce, who were deeply interested in the American pork trade, came here recently, and, choosing some freshly killed French pigs at the abattoir, had them analyzed with the result that several were found to be more or less infected with the newly-invented disease.

That I understood to be with the object of showing that trichina is possible in French pigs. Many here contending that, in the way they are fed, they are more liable to have them than ours, as we have sounder and fresher food.

S. DAVIS, JR., & CO.

We desire to state that this has been the most favorable season for curing meats that we have had for years, and with consumers here and abroad the cure has been pronounced better than last season.

We take great pains with meats for export, being drier than domestic meats when shipped, and for two years have had double covers.

And one matter, very important—for there have been complaints that meats are sent over not fully cured, and sometimes true, and so ordered by French people—we have not this season, or at any time, sent any hams but those fully cured. We have, by cable and letters, given a portion of this information to Governor Noyes, who has our hams for his own use, and whom the writer well knows.

You can see our losses are likely to be severe, and portion of meat may be returned here, and some destroyed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

If made, as asserted, statement is based on erroneous impression in minister's mind formed by isolated items maliciously published for speculative purposes. Most rigid examination adds daily to strength of position of this government in claiming that the hog exports of this country are singularly free from trichina or any communicable disorder. SIR: We beg to call your attention to the inclosed cable dispatch received by us to-day from Messrs. Seignouret Frères of Bordeaux, by which you will see that the efforts being made by those interested in the importation of American meats into France are being seriously hampered and offset by the circulation of false reports in that country respecting the situation of affairs here.

We have for some time, through our agents in Havre, Marseilles, and Bordeaux, been engaged in some effective work, we think, in bringing about the repeal, or at least the modification, of the prohibitory decree of the 18th February last; and as the prompt action taken by yourself in denial of the erroneous statements current about that time were of the utmost value in modifying the original decree, whereby all meats shipped from this country before issuance of the decree were permitted entrance, we now take the liberty to suggest that an official denial be made of the existence of any newspaper articles of the kind mentioned in the inclosed cable dispatch.

Friends of the American meat trade all over France are, we know, meeting with every possible obstacle in their efforts to effect the repeal of this decree, and any official assistance you may see fit to render them by the denial of false rumors will, of course, be of the very greatest value.

Messrs. Seignouret Frères, from whom the inclosed cable dispatch was received by us, are by far the largest dealers in and importers of American meats in France, and have been ever since this prohibitory order was issued unremitting in their exertions toward its repeal.

Confident of your sympathy with the general effort being made to relieve the commercial public, equally with the agricultural interests of this country now suffering from the effects of this prohibitory decree of the French Government, and soliciting your valuable co-operation at this time,

We have, &c.,

Mr. Noyes to Mr. Blaine.

No. 475.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, May 27, 1881. (Received June 10.)

SIR: I have the honor to send you herewith the translation of remarks made in the Chamber of Deputies on the occasion of the interpellation of Mr. Tirard, minister of agriculture and commerce, by the deputy from Havre, on the 24th day of May, 1881. It will be noticed that at the close of the remarks of Mr. Tirard he plainly indicated that as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made for thorough inspection of American meats, he would propose the revocation of the prohibitory decree. I learn also from other sources, unofficial, that this is in contemplation by the French Government.

In answer to your telegram of the 24th instant, referring to certain published statements alleged to have been made by the minister of agriculture and commerce to the deputations from the Chambers of Commerce at Havre and Bordeaux, I take pleasure in saying that after careful inquiry, I am satisfied that the minister did not make the statements imputed to him. What he did say was in substance the same as what appears in the report of his remarks in the Chamber of Deputies herewith inclosed.

You can rest assured that I have neglected no opportunity to assert and emphasize your views upon this question, and very powerful French influences are operating to secure the revocation of the decree. There is unavoidable delay, but I believe the result will be attained after a time.

I have, &c.,

EDWARD F. NOYES.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES, SITTING OF MAY 24, 1881.

Mr. PEULEVEY (Havre) asked to put a question to the minister of agriculture and commerce, relative to the prohibition of American salted meats. He explained that the maintenance of the decree of prohibition caused a great prejudice to an important branch of French commerce. For more than twenty-five years the laboring population had contracted the habit of finding in these meats a healthful element of alimentation. This situation has been overturned by a decree of prohibition. It was charged that American salted meats contained live trichinæ; but it is necessary to know whether the fact is such, and, if so, whether it offers a real danger. Only one case of trichinosis has been established in France, and this was twenty-five years ago at Crépy-en-Valois. But in meats salted for two or three months the trichinæ is dead; at any rate, cooking at 75° will kill it. American salted meats are therefore without any danger, and there can be no motives to maintain the decree of prohibition.

Mr. LIONVILLE said that live trichinæ were found in salted and smoked meats.

Mr. TIRARD, minister of commerce, replied that numerous complaints had been made against the decree which the government had been compelled to issue. With a view of giving satisfaction to those who so complained, the government instituted a bureau of verification which has been in operation since February. In the beginning, when this service was not as yet well-organized, no trichinæ were detected at Havre, but it has happened that the same lots submitted to re-examination in Paris were found to contain trichinæ in great quantity. (Oh! Oh!) Since the Havre service has been reorganized, it has detected trichinæ in an important proportion of the meat examined. It is asked if bad results have followed. But the first duty of the government is to prevent accidents. This is what it has done with all due consideration to freedom of commerce. I can assure you, gentlemen, that the government is continuing the examination of this matter, not in a scientific point of view, for in this respect my opinion is made. I have read all the discussions which have taken place on this subject in France and abroad, and if Mr. Peulevey had seen all the documents published, not only in Europe, but also in America, where the decree of prohibition has created much excitement, he would have found that the Americans themselves admitted that they had not taken the necessary precautions against dangers which might attend their salted meats.

The minister then quoted as supporting his views the report of British commissioners to the United States, and said that the administration is determined not to allow the free circulation of these dangerous products, that it was trying to establish an effective system of inspection, but that so long as it shall not be possible to organize this system on a large scale, it will not take the responsibility of revoking the decree of prohibition.

Mr. PEULEVEY. The minister has said that his opinion was made; this is unquestionable. But upon what facts and documents has he made that opinion? Evidently he must have come to it upon the reports of his inspectors. Now do you know what they have reported? At Bordeaux, of 1,500,000 kilograms of meats, they found only 21 pieces infected, which represents a proportion 0.016 per cent. Why does not the minister adopt the suggestion of creating a commission composed of competent men, to which will be intrusted the duty of determining whether or not the small proportion of trichinæ found in the American porks is dangerous, after remaining three months in salt. Under those conditions trichinæ are absolutely inoffensive, if slightly cooked. In your answer you have not pointed out one single case of trichinosis; you have only opposed an obstinate resistance to the desire of commerce, and I can add that you have refused to enlighten us by means of a scientific commission.

Mr. TIRARD replied that this scientific commission exists, in the committee of hygiene, whose members have been appointed by the President, that he can rely also upon the discussions which have taken place at the academy of medicine. Of course there are controversies upon the subject, but the government cannot wait until all the physicians agree in this respect. Mr. Tirard then said that this very morning he had received from Bordeaux the information that the day before a notable quantity of trichinæ had been detected in American meats. He concluded as follows: As for the revoking of the decree, I repeat that when it shall be found practicable to establish, not only at Havre, but at other ports, and on the frontier, a very complete service of inspection, giving all the necessary guarantees, I will be able to propose to the President to revoke that decree, which has been issued, I must say again, against my desire, and only to secure public health.

No. 235.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Noyes.

No. 379.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 8, 1881.

SIR: Your late dispatches have amply shown your earnestness in carrying out my instructions in the sense of endeavoring to dispel the strange misapprehensions which seem to have possessed the mind of the French Government respecting the sanitary character of American exportations of cured and packed pork. On the other hand I have lost no fitting opportunity of fortifying your position by such instructions, by mail and telegraph, as seemed called for by the singular course of French legislation in practically prohibiting imports of this class into France, and by the unfounded and ascertainedly erroneous statements made in high places even, touching the alleged noxious character of American hog-products.

From the outset, all the facts accessible to its closest scrutiny, convinced this government that the action of that of France in this respect was both mistaken and wrongful. But, not satisfied with this patent knowledge, it lost no time in instituting a most searching investigation for the ascertainment of the truth or falsity of the state of things alleged to exist in this country, and upon which the decrees of the French Government restrictive of importations of pork purported to rest. The result of its investigation is now set before you in the accompanying report of the officer detailed by this Department for the purpose.

It is superfluous to add argument to the cogent statement of facts now made. Their presentation in this manner and supported by strong documentary evidence, satisfies this Department of the entire justice of the ground it has heretofore taken in denying and causing to be denied, the truth of the malicious rumors to which authoritative currency has been given in foreign countries.

The Government of the United States will yield to none in its earnest desire to accomplish all which legislation or executive action can do to protect the public health. Had the result of its preliminary or later and more searching investigations given even the slightest color to the wild statements that American pork was a means of disseminating disease and death at home and abroad, no admission would have been too frank, and no restrictive measures within the power of this government too urgent to expose and check the evil. Its duty to foreign countries in matters of sanitary precaution is no less a subject of jealous concern than its corresponding duty to its own citizens. And, on the other hand, it is equally its duty and grave responsibility to watch over the interests of its producers and exporters when their industries are paralyzed by false reports and popular alarm, touching the supposed injuriousness of their products to the public health.

This responsibility becomes still more grave when a friendly foreign state unwittingly or mistakenly lends its powerful aid to the spreading of a spirit of distrust so directly and well nigh irremediably disastrous in its effects upon legitimate and long-established trade, as has been the action of the Government of France.

You will at once communicate copies of the inclosed report to Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, with such observations of your own as may tend in your judgment to emphasize and confirm its full refutation of the injurious statements concerning the existence of communicable disease and parasitic germs in American pork, under conditions noxious to public health. You will say that this government expects from that of France, no less careful and earnest disposition to accept the truth of the matter in an impartial spirit than has been shown here; that the evidence so diligently sought and now formally presented, is regarded as convincing proof that exaggeration and misstatement, often from interested sources, have been only too successfully combined with popular ignorance and apprehension to the injury of one of the greatest and most wholesome branches of the export trade of this country; and that we deem ourselves rightfully entitled to a prompt and effectual modification of the attitude which the French Government has assumed with respect to this class of exports from the United States. You will advert to the unfortunate effect which the course of the French Government has had in influencing the action of other European Governments; and will intimate our just expectation that the example of France in correcting the error will be no less signal. And you will especially acquaint the minister of foreign affairs of France with the deep regret which the Government of the United States would feel if its honest and frank remonstrances, backed as they now are by irrefragable facts, should fail to induce the French Government to rescind its prohibitory action and so constrain a resort to the painful expedient of retaliatory measures on staple exports from France.

You may read this instruction in your discretion to Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, and should he so desire, you may give him a copy of it.

In reply, I have to say that the Department learns with satisfaction that Mr. Tirard, the minister of commerce, did not make the statements attributed to him, and that it seems probable that the decree prohibiting the importation of American pork into France may soon be revoked.

No. 483.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, June 23, 1881. (Received July 6.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that your dispatch No. 379, of date June 8, 1881, reached this legation yesterday, the 22d instant, and that I immediately prepared a note to the minister of foreign affairs, of which a copy is herewith inclosed. This note, together with two copies of the report on American pork, sent by you, I forwarded to Mr. B. St. Hilaire, by Mr. Vignaud, secretary of legation, who was instructed to request for me an interview with the minister. Accordingly I called by appointment at the foreign office at one o'clock to-day, and had a full and frank conversation with Mr. St. Hilaire.

I represented to him that my government was getting impartient at the long delay in revoking the prohibitory decree; that the interests involved were so great, and the injury inflicted by the action of the French Government upon the commerce of the United States was so disastrous and widespread, that the public sentiment of my country demanded such action on the part of the government at Washington as would effectually protect the interests of the American people. I more than intimated that unless this pork decree was revoked, my government, however reluctanly, might be compelled to resort to retaliatory measures. I said that I only reflected the sentiment of my government when I assured him I should deeply regret such necessity. I impressed upon Mr. St. Hilaire the desirability of an early response to the demand contained in your dispatch, which was read to him in French, and copies of which, in both French and English, I left with him at his request. Much more was said which it is not necessary here to repeat.

The minister seemed to be profoundly impressed with the gravity of the subject, and said that he fully appreciated the importance and significance of your dispatch. He assured me that copies of the papers and documents presented to him would be sent to the minister of agriculture and commerce this afternoon, and that he would confer with him in person not later than to-morrow, with a view of finding some satisfactory solution of this troublesome question, which he earnestly hoped to reach; that serious consideration would be given to the demand of my government, and that I should be informed of the decision reached at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. St. Hilaire asked me if I would like to confer personally with Mr. Tirard, minister of agriculture and commerce, as to the attitude of my government. I answered that I did not care to do so; that the question had now reached that stage where I preferred to communicate with the minister of foreign affairs only.

The report forwarded by you is being translated, and unless the necessity for such a step shall be removed, I propose to have the report, or the more material points of it, printed in French, and distributed where it may seem most desirable to correct an erroneous public sentiment.

I have, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, June 22, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have this day received an important dispatch from the Hon. James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, at Washington, regarding the matter of the decree of your excellency's government prohibiting the importation into France of American pork.

I am instructed to say that immediately after the publication of the decree in question the Government of the United States took earnest and efficient steps to ascertain faithfully and impartially the truth regarding the condition and character of American pork as an article of food, with a view to adopting such measures as might be deemed necessary to insure life and health, in case the facts were found to be as set forth in the report upon which the prohibitory decree of your excellency's government professed to be based. It was apparent from the outset that your excellency's government had been misinformed, and that in consequence its action had been mistaken and wrongful to the government and people of the United States. Recently, however, a more searching and careful investigation has been made by a most competent officer detailed for this purpose by the State Department, the result of which is set forth in the pamphlet, two copies of which I have the honor to inclose herewith to your excellency.

From what appears in this document, and otherwise, my government is satisfied of the entire justice of the ground it has heretofore taken, in denying the truth of the malicious rumors to which authoritative currency has been given in foreign countries. It considers it absolutely certain that there is no disease or infection pertaining to American pork, rendering it dangerous or injurious to life or public health. On the contrary, my government feels perfectly assured that the pork product of the United States is an innocent and healthful article of diet, in almost universal use, and nowhere with disastrous effects.

The honorable Secretary of State directs me to express the hope and belief of my government that your excellency's government will consider the subject with the same desire to know the truth, and to act upon the same when ascertained, that has animated the Government of the United States.

The prohibitory action of the French Government has been adopted in other countries, and it is probable that the limit of disastrous effects has not been reached. The action of your excellency's government is calculated to and does discredit one of the most important of American industries. The revocation of the decree of the French Government would undoubtedly be followed elsewhere as its unfavorable action has been. A serious blow has been inflicted upon American trade and commerce, and, as my government believes, without good and sufficient cause, and it is earnestly hoped that, considering the two great republics of the world, France and America, have so long entertained cordial and intimate relations, your excellency's government will consider the subject in question in a spirit of friendliness and accommodation.

It is the plain duty of all governments to guard and protect the interests of their people, while recognizing their obligations to neighboring and friendly nations. My government is not unmindful of this duty, and in the interest of the American people it protests against a decree which it cannot but regard as arbitrary and unjust, although adopted upon information believed at the time to be reliable, but which subsequent information has failed to accredit.

Four months have now passed since this decree was promulgated. The loss already occasioned to American trade is irreparable, but the future is important. I therefore beg your excellency to inform me at the earliest practicable day as to what is the final determination of your excellency's government in order that the government and people of the United States may be left no longer in doubt.

The report herewith inclosed will be translated into French at the earliest moment possible, and copies will then be forwarded to your excellency.

I avail myself of this occasion, &c.,

EDWARD F. NOYES.

No. 387.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 24, 1881.

SIR: I am informed by the Secretary of the Navy, under date of 21st instant, that orders have been sent to Rear-Admiral John C. Howell, commanding the United States naval force on the European station, directing him to give passage in the United States flag-ship "Trenton" to certain persons who visit the United States in pursuance of the invitation of this government to attend the celebration at Yorktown, Va., on the 19th of October next, in commemoration of the surrender of the British army under Lord Cornwallis to the American and French forces in 1781.

It is desired that you will communicate to Rear-Admiral Howell at as early a date as practicable the names of the persons who are to be received as guests on the Trenton. You will accordingly inquire of Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire whether any of the representatives of the French Government will accept the hospitality thus tendered, and you will make like inquiry of the members of the family of Lafayette.

In this connection I beg you will take an early occasion to send to the Marquis de Rochambeau the inclosed personal letter, in which I convey to him the assurance of the pleasure it would afford the President, as well as myself, to have him visit the United States on this interesting occasion. If the marquis should so desire, the hospitalities of Admiral Howell may be extended to him likewise.

The "Trenton" will leave Nice on or about the 18th of September next. You will take care to notify Admiral Howell in ample season of the day on which his guests may be expected to repair on board the "Trenton" at Nice.

PARIS, July 6, 1881.

MR. MINISTER: It is with the deepest sense of acknowledgment that we have received the letter inviting us in the name of the Government and Congress of the United States to be present at the celebration of the centenary of the surrender of Yorktown.

My eldest brother, Oscar de La Fayette, was seriously ill when this letter reached him. He was profoundly moved by it, and the last act of his life was to testify his sincere gratitude to the minister of the United States, the honorable General Noyes.

We are deeply touched by the honor extended to us, and by this new proof of the sympathies ever living in the heart of the American people for the memory of our grandfather.

The glorious anniversary which you are going to celebrate recall at the same time the most beautiful pages of your history and the most beautiful moments of the youth of La Fayette, when on the battle-fields of Virginia he successfully executed the orders of his general-in-chief and paternal friend, your immortal Washington.

Faithful to the memories bred in the worship of your national traditions, the descendants of La Fayette can only heartily thank you for having thought of associating them with the solemnity of the centenary.

It is difficult for us at present to designate those of our family who will go to America. It is even to be feared that some will be detained by imperious political and family duties, but I am confident, Mr. Minister, that we shall find in the young generation youthful and worthy representatives of the sentiments of our grandfather.

Permit us, Mr. Minister, to beg you to be the interpreter to your government, Congress, and to the American people, of our wishes for the prosperity and the grandeur of the United States, and at the same time to hope that your country and ours united by the same form of government, in the future as in the present, will perpetuate the memories of friendship that date from Yorktown.

EDMOND DE LAFAYETTE,
Senator from Upper Loraine.

And in the name of his cousin, Marquis Jules de Lasteyrie, senator, son of Virginia, sister of my father and née de La Fayette, and his entire family.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch*

* For instruction referred to see instruction No. 187, dated June 24, 1881, to minister to Great Britain.

No. 386, dated June 24, and No. 388, dated June 25, addressed to General Noyes, and both relating to the interoceanic canal which is now projected across the Isthmus of Panama.

The first one states it has fallen under the observation of the President that the great powers of Europe may possibly be considering the idea of jointly guaranteeing the neutrality of this canal, and it makes known to General Noyes the views of the President on the subject, in order that they be frankly communicated to the Government of the French Republic, in case such a plan receive the attention of the powers.

Dispatch No. 338 informs General Noyes it had reached your knowledge through a trustworthy source, that the Colombian Government has decided to make immediate overtures to the European powers for the preparation of a treaty which is to guarantee the neutrality of the isthmus. It instructs the minister here to seek an early opportunity for conferring with Mr. B. St. Hilaire in the matter, and to say after making this explanation, that it was necessary to acquaint the powers with the views of the President in the conclusions which he has formed, and also to read to Mr. B. St. Hilaire your instructions contained in dispatch No. 386, a copy of which was to be left if desired. I have to inform you that in compliance with these instructions I called upon and saw Mr. B. St. Hilaire, yesterday at the ministry of foreign affairs. I stated to him the circumstances of the case, gave him as directed the source and nature of your information regarding the anticipated action of the Colombian Government, and said in order that he may well and fully understand the necessary relations existing between the United States and Colombia, I was instructed to read to him a dispatch, which expressed very fully the President's views on this subject.

Mr. B. St. Hilaire replied that he had heard it mentioned the Colombian Government contemplated taking such a step as the one anticipated, but that he had no official intimation whatever of this being a fact. He added he was glad, however, to know the views of our government in this matter, and suggested that a copy of your dispatch be left with him. I naturally complied with his request. Mr. B. St. Hilaire assured me he would read your communication with due care and consideration, and in case it required an answer that he would seize the first opportunity to transmit it.

PARIS, July 19, 1881.

SIR: I had hastened to call the attention of the minister of agriculture and of commerce to the new dispatch which General Noyes did me the honor to address me regarding the measures adopted in France, in order to prohibit the importation of salt pork of American origin.

Mr. Tirard has just intimated to me the observations which this communication has suggested to him.

In the first place, the Government of the United States appears to attribute the measures in question: 1st. Either to incorrect reports or to exaggerated valuations, coming from interested persons. 2d. Or to popular apprehensions. In this respect the minister of commerce recalls to mind that, on the contrary, it is only in consequence of the most serious investigations made by men, neither whose knowledge nor honorable character could be questioned, that the Government of the Republic believed it had to adopt the decree of last February.

It was necessary to take into consideration, at the same time, the requirements of the public health and the legitimate transactions of commerce. The French Government has striven to conciliate as much as possible these two interests by organizing at Havre a laboratory for inspection.

The salt meats which were in transit at the time of the signature of the aforesaid decree were received in France on condition they should be previously examined by micographers of the laboratory at Havre and acknowledged exempt from trichina. Now, microscopic researches made in this laboratory have confirmed the existence of numerous cases of trichina in the larger portion of salt meat of American origin which have been submitted to inspection. In the face of these facts, mentioned in official reports, it seems difficult to deny the existence, in a large number of American hogs, of a disease communicable to man, and to dispute, consequently, the fitness of the provisions which were made the subject of the decree of the 18th of February.

The Chamber of Deputies has, besides, given its approval to these provisions, and the government only has its wishes carried out by maintaining, until further disposition, the decree of prohibition. It does not the less pursue the study of the means to ameliorate the actual situation by the organization of a service of general inspection, to be applied not only to American salt meats, but to all meats of foreign origin. This service, Mr. Tirard remarks, would have a very appreciable advantage for importers. Indeed, when the local service of inspection which the municipalities have the right to organize in order to secure the healthfulness of the products of consumption would exercise its control it would no longer, but by accident and in very rare instances, have the opportunity to seize and destroy, as unhealthy, meat which had already paid the custom dues. If, as that appears probable, one succeeds in finding a satisfactory mode for inspecting meats of every origin, this general service would relieve commerce of certain difficulties.

Finally, it is, to its very deep regret, that the Government of the Republic has found itself under the necessity, in order to protect the public health, to adopt a measure of prohibition, which, for the moment, caused unavoidable trouble in American meat transactions between France and the United States. But it is confident that the provisions which it has hastened to adopt to modify the rigor of this measure, and those of which it is seeking the realization, must give every satisfaction, as it deeply desires, in the interests of this international commerce. Far from causing an obstacle there, these measures would rather tend to develop it by securing the verification of the good quality of merchandise, and by removing in this way the suspicions of which certain ones of these commodities were the object on the part of consumers.

I beg you, sir, to have the kindness to communicate these diverse considerations to the Government of the United States, which I am pleased to hope will appreciate their value and conciliating character.

Accept, sir, the assurance of the most distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be,

Your very, &c.,

B. ST. HILAIRE.

(In General Assembly, May session, 1881.)

RESOLUTION authorizing the governor to invite the representatives of the Republic of France to visit Rhode Island.

Whereas during the Revolutionary War in the year A. D. 1778, while the British controlled the entrance to Narragansett Bay, and greatly distressed and oppressed the inhabitants of the adjoining territory; and

Whereas in the month of July of that year a French fleet arrived in the said bay, under the command of Admiral d'Estaing, and occasioned the destruction of many of the vessels of the British fleet to the great satisfaction and relief of the inhabitants of the State; and

Whereas in the summer of A. D. 1780, another French fleet, bringing a large land force, arrived in the waters of the said bay, and to the great relief of the inhabitants remained within this State for a considerable time, and afforded protection to the lives and property of the inhabitants of the State; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has invited the Government of the Republic of France to participate in the centennial celebration of the surrender of the British forces in America, to take place at Yorktown in October next, and the Republic of France has signified its intention to be represented at and to participate in the said celebration, therefore, as a token of gratitude, and as showing the appreciation of the people of Rhode Island of the services rendered this State by the fleets and armies of France, it is

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be, and hereby is, directed and authorized to invite the representatives of France who visit the United States to participate in the celebration in October next, to visit the State of Rhode Island at such time during their sojourn in the United States as may be convenient to them, and while the said representatives are within the State to remain the guests thereof, and that his excellency is hereby requested and directed to appoint a committee of such citizens of this State as he may deem proper to assist him in entertaining the guests of the State while here, in such a manner as the committee may believe will be most acceptable to their guests, and that his excellency the governor be, and he hereby is, authorized to draw his orders upon the general treasurer for the expense incident to carrying this resolution into effect.

No. 12.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 9, 1881.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Pomeroy's dispatch No. 495, of the 23d ultimo, transmitting a copy of a note received by him from the minister of foreign affairs of France as to the alleged results of the inspection of American pork by the French authorities and intimating that modifications will be made in the decree issued in February last, in relation to the importation of American pork into France.

I have read with surprise the statement in Mr. St. Hilaire's note to the effect that microscopic researches made in the laboratory at Havre "have confirmed the existence of numerous trichinæ in the larger portion of salt meat of American origin."

This statement is so much at variance with the results of the extended observations on this subject which have been made in this country, that it is believed by this Department that the conclusions arrived at by the French authorities at Havre must be owing to inaccurate inspections, or the result of accidental circumstances. I will therefore thank you to adopt judicious measures to inform yourself as to the accuracy of the inspections made by the French authorities, and at the same time to continue the efforts which your legation has heretofore been instructed to make, with a view to having all unnecessary restrictions upon the importation of American pork into France removed.

No. 6.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, August 11, 1881. (Received August 24.)

SIR: The attitude and correspondent relations of France, England, and the United States, with the South American states, Chili and Peru, since the late termination of hostilities, was the subject of a private interview which I had the honor to have yesterday afternoon at the palace of the Elysée, with President Grévy. The meeting was unofficial, and sought by his excellency for a mutual exchange of thoughts on a subject which appeared to have received his careful study. In the conversation which ensued, his excellency alluded to the two abortive attempts on the part of the Governments of France and England towards effecting some practical agreement between these two South American states. He referred in a general way to the desirability of establishing between our respective governments, the basis of a mutual understanding in regard to the policy which might be jointly adopted by us both towards securing an early return of order and stability in the affairs of Chili and Peru, as far as comports with our national traditions and usages in the management of public affairs with foreign states. He spoke of the many unsatisfied claims of French subjects on the Peruvian Government, and expressed his strong disapproval of the extravagant demands made by the Chilian Government, and conditions of peace, which, if literally enforced, he apprehended, would achieve the permanent enfeeblement, perhaps annihilation of the Peruvian state. In using this language, his excellency indeed acknowledged the right of Chili, as a conquering power, to certain indemnities and privileges to be embodied in the final treaty of peace, &c., but which he thought required particular modification, and he was of the opinion that another attempt at mediation on the part of foreign governments, and especially of the United States, was requisite for the purpose of reaching a satisfactory solution of the present state of chaos and disorder which now there obtains.

In my reply, I said I had received from my government, as yet, no instructions or intimation in regard to the course it might pursue towards these South American states. I felt, however, his own views, as expressed to me, would, if presented, receive the most favorable consideration. I continued to say, my government, I believed, had already striven, but without success, to interpose, as the equal friend, between Chili and Peru, with a view at to a reconciliation, and I had no doubt that, as suggested by President Grévy, a third attempt at mediation, on our part, would be ventured, and I concurred with his excellency in the hope the heavy demands of Chili might possibly be modified, as I also felt that if executed, they must limit, if not extinguish, in that state, the future development of private enterprise, as well as the employment of foreign capital, by which alone its natural resources could receive extension.

At the close of this interview, his excellency requested the informal transmission to you of the substance of his remarks, which I have the honor herewith to do, and I take pleasure to add that I regard this meeting with President Grévy as a renewed instance of the cordial relations now so happily existing between our two republican governments.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Morton.

No. 19.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 18, 1881.

SIR: At the time of my entrance upon the duties of this Department in March last, the question whether this government deemed it an opportune moment for a negotiation with a view to modifying the present treaty stipulations regulating commerce between the United States and France, as presented in Mr. Noyes' dispatch, No. 410, was under consideration by my predecessor and it at once engaged my earnest attention.

In the existing system of tariffs imposed upon importations by the United States and France, there are many features which might be modified with mutual advantage. A revision of the tariff of each with reciprocal adjustments of the duties imposed might do much to relieve trade from burdens which are not necessary, facilitate intercourse, and promote friendly feeling between the two nations.

The policy of this government has, however, been averse to complicating its revenue system by treaty engagements with various powers, establishing separate conventional tariffs applicable only to importations from particular countries.

The legislative power has preferred a uniform tariff, applicable alike to importations of similar articles from all nations. As Congress meets every year, the provisions in detail of our tariff laws can at any time be changed as circumstances prove that alteration is needed; whereas, a conventional or treaty tariff, establishing special rates of duty with a particular country and requiring great nicety of adjustment in reconciling different interests and avoiding unfairness in dealing with all the branches of trade, would not be within the immediate control of Congress nor flexible to the influence of public opinion, representing public interest. Imbedded in solemn treaty stipulations which are usually made with a view to long continuance, no change could be effected except by the slow process of diplomatic negotiation.

The advantages that might be secured by changes in the present commercial restrictions, which would place trade between the United States and France upon easier and more satisfactory conditions, are so obvious in certain points of view, that I thought it would be well to enter upon the discussion of the subject with a view to separating those commercial interests which are continuing and which, being of a permanent nature, are susceptible of comparatively permanent regulation, from those more liable to change, and endeavor to come to an accord in regard to the duties to be imposed by each country in a treaty which would go into effect when a law to carry it into operation should have been passed by Congress, to which body the Constitution of the United States confides "the power to lay and collect duties" and "to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

At that moment, however, arrived the intelligence, that the French Government had by decree prohibited the bringing of American pork into France, on the ground that it was affected by trichinæ to such an extent as to be dangerous to the public health. Information was at once collected by this government, which it is believed proved in the most conclusive manner that the statements circulated in Europe concerning the prevalence of trichinæ in American pork were without foundation, and this information was early brought to the notice of the French Government. Still that decree during many months has been maintained in force. It has tended to rapidly contract commerce with the United States, has deranged business, and has led to an impression throughout this country that is not conducive to the formation, and the successful operation by the aid of Congress, of a treaty to liberate and stimulate the trade of the two countries.

I have waited some time to see whether any indication might be found of a different disposition and that would encourage a hope for substantial results from a discussion of this subject. But so much time has passed that I deem it due to the French Government that it should not longer be kept waiting for an answer to the question propounded through you. I have to request you, therefore, to state to Mr. Barthélemy St. Hilaire that the delay in responding to a question which I found pending was, first, that I might give it that careful consideration demanded by its great importance and the high regard entertained for the government propounding the question, and second, the causes I have set forth above, and that you inform him that while this government is earnestly desirous of doing everything in its power to promote commerce and friendly intercourse between the two nations, it is constrained to say that it deems the present moment inopportune for the negotiation for a treaty of commerce modifying the present tariffs of the United States and France with a view to substantial changes and permanent results which can only be secured by the co-operation of Congress.

No. 11.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, August 19, 1881. (Received September 1.)

SIR: In compliance with instructions contained in your dispatch No. 387, of date June 24, 1881, this legation forwarded to the Marquis de Rochambeau the letter which conveyed to that gentleman an invitation to be present at the celebration of the centenary of the surrender of Yorktown. The Marquis de Rochambeau was informed at the same time the hospitality of the flag-ship Trenton would be also extended to him to transport him to the United States, should he so desire. With due appreciation of this act of courtesy the marquis has declined the hospitality of the flag-ship Trenton. Still, as he is one of the delegates selected by the French Government, he will be present at the Yorktown centenary.

I have the honor herewith to inclose to you his letter, addressed to you, in which he gives expression to his sense of obligation for the invitation of which he is the recipient.

As you enjoined, the Trenton has also been placed at the disposal of, first, the other members of the French delegation which will shortly repair to our country, through Mr. B. St. Hilaire; and, second, of the La Fayette family, through the senator, Mr. Edmond de La Fayette.

The latter gentleman has declined this offer for himself and relatives, on the ground that the electoral campaign, which is now open, interferes and prevents their departure from their country at so early a date as September 18, the day fixed upon for the Trenton to sail. The same reasons have influenced the action of the French Government, also, in this matter. Their delegates will secure passage on a French trans-Atlantic steamer, and leave for the United States on or about the 24th of September.

Marquis de Rochambeau to the Secretary of State.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: I am highly honored by the invitation which the President of the United States and yourself have been pleased to address to me, to take part in the fêtes of the centenary of Yorktown. I already knew by experience that the American people preserve with religious care the memory of services rendered, as was abundantly proven to me by the marks of sympathy which I had received in the United States on the occasion of my visit in 1876.

This new evidence of courtesy on the part of that people is a striking confirmation of this fact, and it will be to me at the same time a duty and a pleasure to unite with you in celebrating the anniversary of that famous victory, which founded in so durable a manner the autonomy of the American people.

I have been deeply affected by the assault which endangered the life of President Garfield; but I hope to find him completely recovered from his wounds. Will you have the goodness, Mr. Secretary of State, to transmit to him the expression of my sentiments of grateful appreciation; and accept for yourself the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

No. 24.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, September 1, 1881. (Received September 15.)

SIR: The French elections are now concluded. For the Republican party responsibility has begun, compromise and half-way measures practically ceased. Excited action and political confusion will, from present indications, be held in check in the chambers and throughout the country. The departmental elections are also strongly Republican in character, and their result clearly indicates the general opinion that a republican form of government, at the present time, meets the wants and receives the sympathies and support of the masses of the French people. At this moment the republic in France may be said to be consolidated and placed beyond successful attack. Ninety years of perplexing experience has developed democratic ideas into a tower of strength. It must be most gratifying to the government and people of the United States that a country which, one hundred years ago, powerfully contributed to the establishment of our independence, has itself adopted the free institutions which have placed us in the foremost rank of nations.

The political struggle which has just drawn to a close is, furthermore, remarkable for the absence of all government pressure on the electors, and of any attempt to "mobilize" universal suffrage. This confirms the strength which the republic has gained since 1877, and shows that the progress of republican ideas has been steady and uninterrupted. Some explanation for the apathy and non-appearance of passion in the political arena to-day may, perhaps, be found in the fact that the parties hostile to liberal institutions have lost ground, and consequently courage, in every electoral campaign since 1871; and that the wisdom and moderation of the programme adopted by the republican leaders has, in a high degree, secured the confidence of the people. This programme would seem to be replete with measures and plans for the future. The canceling of the estimates for public worship, the rupture of the concordat, the secularization of education, the remission of certain unpopular taxes, and the revision of the constitution regarding the mode of election to the senate, when brought forward in the chamber, are positive and practical steps, which are likely to gain the heart and mind of the nation.

The most accurate returns of ballots, as now ascertained, give the Republicans 398 and the Reactionists 85, out of a total of 547, leaving fresh ballots to be taken in 64 districts on the 4th of September. The aggregate number of the opposition in the chamber, of all shades, will probably be about one hundred. The Monarchical party obtained a majority in only four departments, viz, Maine et Loire, La Loire Inférieure, le Morbihan, and la Vendée, which latter was celebrated in the wars of the revolution for adhesion to royalty and opposition to innovation.

It has been often affirmed, France is a country that requires a personal government. In whatever sense this may be interpreted, at the present time it seems to be the general opinion a new ministry will be called to replace the present one, and that Mr. Gambetta will, at last, take the reins and form a cabinet which will enjoy the confidence of the legislature and promote the various measures of reform.

No. 25.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, September 2, 1881. (Received September 15.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of August 26, in reference to the French delegation to the Yorktown centenary, a copy of which is herewith inclosed. On the 30th ultimo, in a telegram, a copy of which is also inclosed, I replied briefly to your queries. I will endeavor now to make this reply more full and explicit.

The French Government has secured for its delegates, and for all other delegates who will be pleased to join them, passage on board of a French steamer which is to sail from Havre to New York on September the 24th. The French official delegation is composed of six different groups, viz:

1. One special representative of the President, Commander of Cavalry Lichtenstein, of the military staff of Mr. Grévy.

2. The three members of the French legation at Washington.

3. Three persons selected by the French foreign office, viz: The Marquis de Rochambeau; M. de Corcelle, secretary of embassy (a relative of the Lafayette family); Mr. ———, not yet designated.

4. Five delegates from the war office, viz: General Boulanger, Colonel Bossan, Lieutenant-Colonel Blondel, Chief of Battalion Bureau de Pusey, and Captain Mason.

5. Seven delegates from the navy department: Admiral Halligon, two "captains of vessels of line," two "captains of frigate," and two lieutenants of vessels.

6. One delegate from the department of fine arts, viz, Mr. Regamey.

The chairman of the delegation will be M. Outrey. It is the intention of the party to proceed from New York to Newport in order to accept the invitation extended by the authorities of Rhode Island. From that State they repair to Baltimore, and thence to Washington and Yorktown.

Two men-of-war the Magicienne, bearing the flag of Admiral Halligon, and the Dumont d'Urville, are ordered to proceed to New York. The last named will anchor in advance at Sandy Hook to await the steamer having on board the delegation, and will escort her to New York. The Magicienne will be at New York the day of their arrival.

Besides the French official delegation, there will be ten or twelve persons invited by the Yorktown Association through the Marquis of Rochambeau, who has given me the following names:

1. Capt. Henry d'Aboville.
2. M. Christian d'Aboville, grandsons of the commander of the French artillery at Yorktown.
3. Lieutenant de Grasse, great-grandson of the commander of the French fleet at Yorktown.
4. M. de Menonville, captain of curiassiers, great-grandson of M. de Menonville, aid major-general in the army of Rochambeau.
5. M. de Chabannes La Palice.
6. M. Jean de Chatillon.
7. M. d'Olonnes.
8. M. Laur de Lestrade.
9. M. de Noailles.
10. M. de St. Simon.
11. M. de Haussonville.
12. M. Clermont Tonnerre de Vaudreuil.

The last named, eight in number, are connected by family ties with officers of the same name who occupied prominent positions in the French army or navy which operated at Yorktown.

I understand that the French Government will defray the expense of passage of its own official delegation; this will not include, however, that of the gentlemen invited by the Yorktown Association. Both delegations embark, however, on the same steamer, the 24th instant.

In regard to the Lafayette delegation, I have no other information to impart but what was conveyed to you in my dispatch No. 11 of August 19. M. Edmond de Lafayette has accepted our invitation in the name of his family, but he has not made known yet the names of those who will avail themselves of this invitation. This gentleman is in bad health and absent from Paris. He has not replied to a communication in relation to this matter from Mr. Vignaud, second secretary of legation.

No. 30.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 5, 1881.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 6, of date August 11, 1881, giving an account of your interview on the day previous with the President of the Republic in regard to the attitude and correspondent relations of France, Great Britain, and the United States with the South American states, Chili and Peru.

The remarks made and the suggestions offered by President Grévy concerning the situation of affairs in Peru, have received that careful and respectful consideration due to the utterances of so eminent a statesman and the Chief Magistrate of France. I hasten to say that this government agrees with him in profoundly deploring the disorders and sufferings that have already fallen upon and the others that continue to impend over the people of Peru, and fully shares the humane and enlightened sentiments which have inspired in him a personal interest in that unfortunate struggle and have induced him to suggest a concerted effort by France, Great Britain, and the United States to bring the conflict to an end.

Such interventions are frequent in European diplomatic history, and have been sometimes followed by beneficial results in preserving the equilibrium of the powers. But the United States has not belonged to that system of states, of which France and Great Britain are such important members, and has never participated in the adjustment of their contentions. Neither interest nor inclination leads this country to wish to have a voice in the discussion of those questions, but our relations to the states of the American continent are widely different, and the situation is so nearly reversed that this government, while appreciating the high and disinterested motive that inspired the suggestion, is constrained to gravely doubt the expediency of uniting with European powers to intervene, either by material pressure or by moral or political influence, in the affairs of American states. Those republics are younger sisters of this government. Their proximity of situation, similarity in origin and frame of government, unity of political interest on all questions of foreign intercourse, and their geographical remoteness from Europe have naturally given to American States close and especial relations to each other, and, in the course of time, removed them farther from the European system. The interests, commercial and political, of the United States on this continent transcend in extent and importance those of any other power, and where these immense interests are deeply involved this government must preserve a position where its influence will be most independent and efficient.

In the contest between Peru and Chili, the United States has watched the progress of the struggle with painful interest, and endeavored, as opportunity offered, to arrange terms of peace, and you will say to the French Government that while the interest which President Grévy has manifested for the cause of peace, and his sympathy with the unhappy victims of this war find an earnest response here, both from the government and the people, the United States declines to enter into negotiations with European powers for a joint intervention in the affairs of Chili and Peru.

SIR: On the 2d instant I had the honor of transmitting to the Department a partial list of the gentlemen composing the different French delegations to the Yorktown Centenary. I have now to state that yesterday I received from the French foreign office a new and revised list of these delegations, a copy of which is herewith inclosed.

This list is now complete; it comprises the names of all those who will represent France at the Yorktown celebration, whether delegated by the French Government, delegated by the Lafayette family, or invited specially by the Yorktown Association. All the gentlemen named on this list, except the members of the French legation at Washington, and the officers of the two men-of-war, the Magicienne and the Dumont d'Urville, will sail to-morrow, the 24th instant, from Havre, on board the French transatlantic steamer Canada.

THE FRENCH DELEGATIONS TO YORKTOWN.

1. Delegation of the President of the Republic.—M. Lichtenstein, commander of cavalry, of the staff of the President.

2. Delegation of the foreign office.—M. Outrey, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Washington; M. de Corcelle, secretary of embassy at the foreign office at Paris; M. Gerard, secretary of embassy at Washington; M. Berard, secretary of embassy at Washington; M. de Pouqueville, secretary of embassy at Paris; M. de Caux, attaché d'ambassade at Washington.

3. Delegation of the army.—M. le General Boulanger; M. Bosson, colonel of dragoons; M. Blondel, lieutenant-colonel of artillery; M. Bureaux de Pusy, chief of battalion; M. Mason, colonel of infantry; M. de Sahune, lieutenant of dragoons.

4. Delegation of the navy.—Rear-Admiral Halligan; M. Musset de Pagnac, captain of vessel-of-war; M. Thomas, lieutenant of vessel; M. de la Barrière, captain of frigate; M. Cavalier de Cuverville, captain of vessel; M. Deschamps, captain of frigate; M. Shilling, lieutenant of vessel; M. de Grasse, lieutenant of infantry of marine.

5. Delegation of the department of fine arts.—Mr. Regamey, artist.

6. Delegation of the Lafayette family.—Count Paul de Beaumont, son of Gustave de Beaumont, who married a daughter of George Washington Lafayette; M. Gaston de Sahune, subprefect. His father married another daughter of George Washington Lafayette; M. Sigismond de Sahune, brother of the former; M. Bureaux de Pusy; M. de Corcelle. The two former delegated by the war department, the latter by the foreign office, are also members of the Lafayette family, who will therefore have five representatives in the delegation.

7. Delegation of descendants of French officers who commanded at Yorktown.—Marquis de Rochambeau, delegated by the French Government; M. de Grasse, delegated by the navy department; M. Henri d'Aboville, lieutentant of cavalry; M. Christian d'Aboville; Count d'Ollone, retired officer; Viscount d'Ollone, son of the former; M. de Lestrade; M. de Noailles, lieutenant of infantry. The six last named are invited by the Yorktown Association.

SIR: With reference to my dispatch No. 39, of date September 23, which contained the names of the representatives of the French Government, and also of the members of the families of Rochambeau and Lafayette, who, on invitation of our government, attend the centennial celebration of the surrender of Yorktown, I have now the honor to inclose a communication from the Senator, Mr. Edmond de Lafayette, in which he expresses deep regret at not being able to be present himself at this great international reunion, but refers to the representation of his family in the persons of his nephews.

I have here to correct a mistake contained my dispatch No. 25, which referred to Colonel Mason, who is, in fact, a captain. This gentleman, a naturalized Frenchman, is the son of the former American minister to France, John Y. Mason, esq., of Virginia, who died at his post in 1859.

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: I learn that the representatives of the French Republic sent to be present at the celebration of the centenary, have just embarked. I would have greatly desired to join them, but, for some time, I am a sufferer, and the state of my health does not permit me to undertake this journey. I feel in consequence deep sorrow. My nephews, happier than myself, leave with the French mission; they are devoted adherents to their country, and the Lafayette family will have in them young and worthy representatives. I cannot express too deeply my regret that I am unable to accompany them. Would you kindly be the interpreter to your government, and to Congress, of all my regrets. It would have been very agreeable to me to see again your great and beautiful country, in which I received, twenty years ago, so flattering and cordial an hospitality in memory of the name of Lafayette, the friend and the companion in arms of Washington.

Please accept, Monsieur le Ministre, the assurance of my very distinguished consideration.

No. 48.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, October 6, 1881. (Received October 21.)

SIR: I am advised unofficially that the minister of agriculture and commerce has at last determined to establish a certain number of laboratories for the purpose of inspecting pork with the microscope. These laboratories are to be located at certain ports of entry, through which all foreign pork intended for France will have to pass, whether coming from the United States or elsewhere. It is not believed, however, that any of these laboratories can be established before some time, owing to the difficulty of finding a sufficient number of men competent to make an efficient use of the microscope.

From what I understand, this step of Mr. Tirard will not give much satisfaction to the French importers of American pork, and I must say that I cannot see the object of the French minister of commerce in persisting in this unjustifiable war on American pork.

If there is a fact well established now, even in France, it is that trichina, which may be found in American pork, is absolutely inoffensive, the salt killing the animalculæ or reducing it to such a state that the slightest cooking achieves its destruction. French scientists of the highest grade and reputation, such as Messrs. Collin, of the great veterinary school of Alfort, Rebourgeon, a well known veterinary surgeon, formerly inspector of the slaughter houses of Paris, Pouchet, professor of biology at the museum of Paris, Peunetier, professor at the museum of Rouen, Zundel, of Strasburg, Dr. Davaine, of the Academy of Medicine, agree with the statement, which is not contradicted by any one having their scientific training and notoriety. * * *

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 48, of date October 6, 1881, I have the honor to report that in an interview which I had yesterday with

Mr. B. St. Hilaire, minister of foreign affairs, I called his attention to certain articles which had recently appeared in the French papers with reference to the appointment of inspectors of American pork, and expressed a desire to learn what, if any, action had been taken or decided upon by Mr. Tirard, minister of agriculture and commerce.

I referred to the fact that the decree prohibiting the importation of American pork had now been in force for more than eight months, and stated that the American Government and people were of opinion that such decree had been issued by the French Government under a misapprehension of the facts in the case, as I claimed had been clearly established by the result of your investigations, reports of which had been submitted to him.

I also stated that the method of inspection which it had been reported that the minister of agriculture and commerce had decided to adopt, was not, in my judgment, a feasible one, for the reason that the delay which would necessarily be caused by such proposed examination would almost if not entirely preclude the importation of American pork.

Mr. B. St. Hilaire replied that he was not aware of the present intentions of his colleague, Mr. Tirard, but that he would make it his business to see him at once to discuss the matter, and he would communicate to me the result of his conversation.

I urged him to represent to his colleague that there was but one practical mode of putting an end to this troublesome matter, which was to abrogate the decree of prohibition.

The minister assured me that he had always been in favor of a solution of this difficulty which would give entire satisfaction to the United States Government, but that the question, though political in one respect, had a practical and technical side upon which he was not competent to pass judgment. He admitted, however, that he was favorably impressed by my arguments, and promised that he would ask and strongly recommend the repeal of the decree.

No. 58.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, October 20, 1881. (Received November 3.)

SIR: A few days since I had the honor of a personal interview with President Grévy, to whom I communicated the subject of your dispatch No. 30, with reference to the affairs of Chili and Peru.

The President expressed himself as in entire accord with the position taken by the Government of the United States, as indicated in your dispatch and the letter addressed by General Hurlbut to the Chilian admiral, copies of the latter of which having been furnished to the President and myself by Mr. Rosas, the minister of Peru, appointed by the Calderon government.

He added that annexation by a victorious nation of the whole or a large part of the territory of the subdued nation, or even the exaction of an undue indemnity of war, was contrary to the now admitted rights of nations as well as to the interests of neutrals. That a victorious nation had the right to secure the fruits of its victories there was no doubt, but it had not the right to impose upon its powerless enemy burdens amounting to annihilation.

In reply to my reference to the sentiment and traditions which had so long existed in the United States in regard to what might be termed joint action with European powers, he replied that he was fully aware of the existence of such feeling, and that he could well understand its force and legitimate foundation.

As to the negotiations between Peru and Chili he said that he had made known his views to me, but with no definite intentions of doing more than extending the good offices of France if they were needed.

The United States, he further remarked, was fully competent to deal with the matter, and he was glad to see that it had realized the situation and was ready to meet the circumstances of the case, and France gave a most cordial approval to the action which had been taken by the United States.

I remarked that the United States and many other countries had already recognized the Calderon government; to which he replied that France had not yet done so, because it seemed to her that the Calderon government had rather the support of the Chilian Government than of the people of Peru; but that as soon as it appeared evident that it was national in its character France would recognize it with pleasure.

Before leaving, the President remarked to me that although our conversation was unofficial in the sense that he could do nothing in the matter without consultation with the minister of foreign affairs, the views and opinions he had expressed were those of the French Government. This statement he emphatically authorized me to make to my government.

In another conversation which I have had since the interview with Mr. Grévy referred to on the same subject, he reiterated his expression of the foregoing sentiments. I summed up the position taken by France by declaring, very explicitly that it was willing to act with or in the same direction as the United States, if the latter so desired, or to leave the Government of the United States to proceed alone if it preferred the latter course.

No. 63.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, October 28, 1881. (Received November 10.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I accepted the invitation of the Franco-American committee to take part, on Monday the 24th instant, in a ceremony connected with the provisional erection of the Bartholdi statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," which is, when completed, to be erected in the harbor of New York, on a site to be set apart by the United States Government.

The following is a report of the proceedings, as published in Galignani's Messenger, of the 25th instant, including the remarks made by Senator Laboulaye and myself.

M. BARTHOLDI'S STATUE OF LIBERTY.

Yesterday the Hon. L. P. Morton, United States minister in Paris, visited the establishment of MM. Gaget, Gauthier et Cie, Rue de Chazelles, to fix the first rivet destined to unite to its basement M. Bartholdi's statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World." The premises were decorated with the French and American flags. His excellency was received on his arrival by M. Laboulaye, senator, president of the committee of the Franco-American Union, MM. Henri Martin and Bozerian, senators, the mayor of the seventeenth arrondissement, and others. The platform was suitably adorned for the occasion.

M. Laboulaye addressed the American minister in the following terms:

"One hundred years ago our brothers fought together to secure the independence of America. At that time was formed a friendship which during a century has undergone no change. In the trials which you have passed through the wishes of France have always been for the maintenance of the Union and prosperity of the Great Republic. It is in order to give a visible type of this venerable friendship that M. Bartholdi and his friends have proposed to the Americans to erect, at public cost, in the bay of New York, this magnificent statue of 'Liberty Enlightening the World.' May the next centenary awaken the same echoes in the hearts of our last descendants; may the compatriots of Washington, the compatriots of Lafayette, celebrate, as we do to-day, this fraternal union, which time will only have strengthened, for the perpetual friendship of France and America." [Applause.]

Mr. Morton replied as follows:

"MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN: I accepted with great pleasure the invitation with which your committee honored me, to take part in the ceremonies connected with the provisional inauguration of the colossal statue of Liberty, to commemorate the sympathy and friendship so long existing between France and the United States. When the Congress of the United States was informed by the President that citizens of France proposed to erect a colossal bronze statue of 'Liberty Enlightening the World,' upon one of the islands of New York Harbor, by a unanimous vote it authorized and directed the President to accept your gift, and to set apart a suitable site for its erection. He was directed also to cause it to be inaugurated, when completed, with such ceremonies as would serve to testify the gratitude of the people of the United States for a monument so felicitously expressive of the sympathy of her sister republic. [Applause.[The resolution of Congress also ordered suitable provision to be made for the future maintenance of the statue as a beacon, and for its permanent care and preservation as a monument of art and of the continued good-will of the great nation which aided us in our struggle for freedom.

"The names of Lafayette, Rochambeau, de Noailles, and others, associated with this new evidence of your friendship, have been household words in the Republic of the New World since their ancestors and their associates gave so freely of their blood and treasure to secure its independence. I should add to this roll of honor, if I might be allowed to do so in his presence, the name of your distinguished chairman, the gifted interpreter to the French people of our political institutions and national constitution. And now to this roll will be added the name of August Bartholdi, the distinguished sculptor and author of the grand statue which we inaugurate to-day.

"France and the United States have, during the last few days, joined in a celebration on the historic field of Yorktown, of the crowning victory secured by their allied armies one hundred years ago, and to-day we raise a monument to the liberty for which they fought. May this grand monument stand at the entrance of the great harbor of the New World as an illuminated emblem of friendship between the two leading republics of the world which shall last for all time to come." [Loud applause.]

Amongst others present, we also noticed Senator Gibson, General Reed, Mr. Sands, Mr. Henry Vignaud, Mr. Pomeroy, chief secretary to the legation; Mr. Walker, consul-general; Count Serurier, M. L. Simonin, and M. Dietz Monin.

No. 65.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, October 31, 1881. (Received November 12.)

SIR: The Legislative Chambers were opened on the 28th instant, at 3 o'clock p. m., in the usual manner. In the Senate the president, Mr.

Leon Say, read the order of President Grévy convoking that body in extraordinary session for that day. He declared that the officers of the Senate were to remain in the discharge of their duties, and pronounced the House formally constituted.

The Chamber of Deputies was opened at the same hour, the oldest deputy, M. Guichard, taking the chair in conformity with a rule of the House. The present being an entirely new Chamber, new officers were selected. M. Guichard, on taking the chair, made a short address, in which he defined what he considered to be the political indications of the last election. These he declared to be the maintenance of the republic with progressive reforms, such as separation of church and state, the abolition of appropriations for the clergy, repeal of irremovability of the judiciary, and the revision, in a more democratic sense, of the mode of election of Senators. These sentiments were received in the chamber with great applause.

The next business in order was the election of temporary officers to serve until the validation of the election of the members of the House was accomplished.

M. Gambetta, who was not a candidate for the permanent presidency of the House, was willing, however, to be voted for as temporary president, in order to test the feeling of the new House towards him politically. His election was carried by a majority, which indicates increased strength with his party.

M. Gambetta, on taking his seat the next day, thanked the House briefly for the honor conferred, but abstained from all allusion to political questions. The House immediately proceeded to the election of the other temporary officers of the Chamber, and then commenced the validation of the deputies.

It is believed M. Gambetta will be invited by President Grévy to form a new Cabinet, when it is expected M. Brisson, the first vice-president, will be elected president of the chamber.

Your course with reference to this matter meets with my hearty approval, and I hope you will avail yourself of every favorable opportunity to press the subject upon the consideration of the French Government, especially as the very distinct promise of Mr. St. Hilaire to move his colleague Mr. Tirard to repeal the objectionable decree affords ground for the hope that a change for the better is taking place in the views of the French authorities in regard to the question.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 54, of date October 13, 1881, stating that I had called on Mr. B. St. Hilaire to ascertain what action Mr. Tirard, minister of agriculture and commerce, had taken in relation to American pork, I have now the honor to transmit a copy and translation of a dispatch of the French minister of foreign affairs giving the information desired. Mr. Tirard says, through his colleague, that his department has prepared a bill to give the authority of law to certain measures which will render possible the revocation of the decree of prohibition.

I have been unable to procure a copy of the bill, but I am informed that it will not tend to facilitate the importation of salted meats from the United States. One of the largest French importers of American meats, who has had the privilege of glancing over the bill, says that the measures proposed are so vexatious that he would prefer the decree of prohibition to the proposed bill.

It will, I fear, be impossible to secure from the present minister of agriculture and commerce the abrogation or any satisfactory modification of the decree of February 18, 1881.

SIR: You have done me the honor, in a recent interview, to express the desire to know, as soon as possible, the result of the examination of the question of the importation of American salted meats into France by the proper administration.

I have hastened to recommend this matter to the particular attention of the minister of agriculture and commerce. In reply to this communication, Mr. Tirard declares that his department studied the measures destined, whilst protecting the interests of public health, to render possible the revocation of the prohibition pronounced by the decree of the 18th of last February; but it is necessary that these measures be sanctioned by a law, the draft of which consequently be submitted very shortly to the notification of parliament.

I am pleased, sir, in referring to the letter which I had occasion to address on the same subject to Mr. Pomeroy, the 19th of last July, to renew to you the expression of the ardent desire which the French Government experiences to give, in this circumstance, every satisfaction to the legitimate interests of international commerce. The economic views of the government of the republic can only, besides, contribute to favor between France and the United States the development of their trade; but he regrets to state that the custom-house legislation of the Union opposes to it very numerous difficulties. He would be happy, I hardly require to say, to meet in the Federal Government a disposition which would permit the amelioration under this head of the commercial relations between the two countries, and to place them more completely in harmony with the state of their political relations.

Add discreetly, that an assurance from French Government that prohibition will be rescinded is just now especially desirable and pressing as Congress is about to assemble, and continuance of prohibition will lead to at least defensive if not retaliatory legislation against importations from France.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 8th instant, informing me that you have recently received, by telegraph, from the minister of foreign affairs of your government, a dispatch stating that the Submarine Cable Company, whose line connects France with the United States, asks to be authorized to make with the English company arrangements which would constitute a kind of fusion, and that before adopting a decision your government would be glad to know what are the intentions of this government.

In the correspondence on the subject which preceded the granting of the concession by the Government of the United States to the French company, certain conditions were proposed by this government, and amongst them the following:

That the company shall not consolidate or amalgamate with any other line, or combine therewith, for the purpose of regulating rates.

These stipulations were entered into before permission to land the cable was given, and were required by this government after deliberate consideration, and in accordance with a policy which had been already applied in another case. This government felt the more confident assurance that the obligations thus distinctly assumed would be faithfully kept, because the action and policy of France had imposed a similar stipulation in the instrument of concession under which the cable was to be laid. The Government of the United States finds no reason to favor any waiver or modification of the obligation, and will expect a faithful adherence to it on the part of the cable company.

In thus explicitly stating to you the position of this government, which at the instance of your government you have opened to me, I have the honor to request to be informed as early as may be in your power what the disposition and purpose of your government are in the premises.

The President of France to the President of the United States.

Jules Grévy, President of the French Republic, to the President of the United States of America:

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: I have just received the letter which was addressed to me by your honorable predecessor, His Excellency Rutherford B. Hayes, informing me that in pursuance of a resolution of Congress he invited the French Government and people to unite with the government and people of the United States of America, on the 19th day of October next, in celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the battle of Yorktown.

I have accepted this invitation in the name of the Government of the Republic and in that of the entire French people. This evidence of the remembrance preserved by your fellow-citizens of the part taken by the French soldiers in those glorious battles which secured independence and liberty to the United States, has produced deep emotion in France, and I have felt happy to be the interpreter thereof, in replying to General Noyes, your worthy representative "that, having shared the toil, we would also share the honor." The American nation, which has become so powerful and prosperous, consecrates forever, by fraternally inviting us to share in the celebration of this anniversary, that union to which free and noble aspirations, and a fortunate association in arms gave birth, and which our institutions, now of a similar character in both countries, must draw closer and develop for the welfare of both nations.

Offering you the assurance of my high esteem for yourself personally, and my best wishes for the glory of the United States, I desire likewise to thank Mr. Hayes for the cordial sentiments expressed by him towards me, and for his wishes for the prosperity of the French Republic.

Written at Paris, March 25, 1881.

JULES GRÉVY.

No. 275.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Outrey.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 25, 1881.

SIR: Referring to the conversation I had the honor to hold with you on Wednesday last in relation to the decree issued by the French Government on the 18th of February, 1881, prohibiting the importation of American pork into France because of the danger to the public health from the trichinæ with which it was infested, I have the honor to recall to your attention some of the salient facts bearing upon this question of maintaining, modifying, or repealing the decree.

The intelligence that such a decree had been suddenly promulgated was received with surprise and regret everywhere in the United States, as it was manifest that it would paralyze an important branch of commerce between the two countries. The surprise was heightened by learning that this hostility to American pork was based upon a declaration that it was so infested with trichinæ as to be dangerous to the public health.

In order to ascertain in the most precise, full, and authentic manner what were the facts, this government immediately directed the chief officer of the bureau of statistics of the State Department to proceed to those cities which were the principal centers of the pork trade, Chicago and Cincinnati, and investigate thoroughly this great industry through every step, to examine into the methods of raising and feeding, to visit the principal packing establishments, to confer with the officers of the public health, to exhaust every means of arriving at the exact truth with regard to the character of the pork product of the country.

That examination was faithfully made, and the facts, established by abundant proof, were simple and conclusive. American swine are of the best breeds, are fed upon corn—a more wholesome food than is given them in other countries; they are not more liable to disease here than elsewhere, and the percentage infected with trichinæ is probably less, on account of this superiority of food and breed, than in any other country; packers and curers exercise care and skill that are nowhere surpassed, and the pork selected for the foreign market is equal to the best sold in the home trade. The officers of the public health report trichinosis one of the rarest diseases known, and no case ever known where the meat was cooked. In Chicago but two cases were known in a record of 40,000 deaths, and in both cases the meat was uncooked; in Cincinnati the health officer reported that he had never known a case in that city, where pork is abundant, cheap, and of universal consumption. As a scientific fact, in certain very rare examples, there is such a disease; as a practical fact, as a danger to the public health, it is unknown in this country—the country where more pork to the inhabitants is eaten than in any other in the world; where, in some form, it is upon the table of almost every family every day in the year.

Turning from this country to Great Britain, where the consumption of American pork is the largest among the nations of Europe, we have not found a single case of trichinosis from American pork. The British national habit of always cooking meat before eating it is an absolute safeguard against the possibility of danger, and that government has made no endeavor to prohibit the pork trade, domestic or foreign, as in any degree dangerous to the health of the people.

The Government of Switzerland, after a thorough investigation of the subject, which was ordered at the time of the uneasiness, created in the public mind in Switzerland by the prohibition in France, for the proclaimed reason that American pork was dangerous to the public health, determined that the danger was so remote as to be practically imaginary, and that complete security was afforded by simply cooking the meat.

The Government of Belgium, after like examination, came to the same conclusion as Switzerland. In Germany and Austria-Hungary, the existence of trichinosis is reported by the authorities to be of rare occurrence, though it is stated that there have been more condemnations of German and Servian swine on account of the presence of trichiniæ, than of American.

The habit of eating pork raw prevails among many Germans, and accounts for the cases of the disease sometimes found.

The prohibition of American pork by Austria-Hungary, which is a pork exporting country, and supplies largely to France, following quickly upon the French decree was in effect of minor importance, inasmuch as American pork is not sent there in large quantities. No case, however, of trichinosis, from American pork, can be ascertained to have occurred there—all those reported having arisen from eating the pork of that country, and in each case, uncooked.

If the search is fruitless in this country or elsewhere for any adequate cause for the announcement by the French Government of the dangers to the public health from American pork, and its consequent exclusion from your ports, inquiry naturally turns to France to discover how extensive had been the mortality there from this cause; but I have yet to learn of a single case in France of death from trichinosis arising from eating American pork.

The one case of which much was said in the newspapers about the time the decree was issued is reported, on good authority, to have been caused by eating French pork.

It was apparent, therefore, that the alarm which had inspired the decree of February 18th had no sufficient basis. The facts in regard to the character and quality of our pork, product, as amply shown, in the investigation instituted by this government and briefly referred to above, were duly laid before the minister of foreign affairs at Paris as early as last May, and it was confidently hoped that, upon recognizing them, that government would revoke the decree and put an end to the injury inflicted by it upon the common interests of two friendly nations. Still the decree has been maintained in force with undiminished rigor through nearly ten months, resulting in the destruction of this immense trade between the two countries, lately so flourishing and amounting to over twenty millions of dollars per annum.

Although it may have inured somewhat to the profit of those engaged in pork raising in France and the adjoining countries, by excluding a competitor from the market, it has not only inflicted great individual losses upon French and upon American citizens by putting an end to this enormous trade, and raised the price of food to the people of France, especially the poorer classes, but it has also tended strongly to check the growing commercial intercourse, the general interchange of commodities, and the rapidly increasing trade between the citizens of the two republics—a growth which has so long been going on and which has been viewed with the liveliest satisfaction and fostered with assiduous care by this government. The disturbance of the complex and closely interwoven interests of commerce has extended far beyond the commodity now under discussion.

It is true that some of the indirect results of the accusation of unhealthfulness have been beneficial to the pork product. Packers have exercised more vigilance than ever. Farmers appreciate more than formerly the value of their choice breeds and superior food. No precaution is neglected in preparing for the foreign market, that the article may be ready for the severest test and most rigid inspection of expert judges and watchful rivals.

But these facts, which are widely discussed by the newspapers and the people, have only tended to make the continuance of the prohibition appear more unnecessary, and there has resulted a disposition in many minds towards defensive, if not retaliatory, legislation.

You will bear me witness that I have spared no effort since the announcement of the decree to avert the present situation of this question, which is in so many points of view to be regretted.

This government has diligently addressed itself to the enlightened judgment of French statesmen by offering all the information which could be obtained to show the needless character and injurious effect of the decree now so long in force, and which, contrary to what we are sure is the sentiment of the French Government and people, has the air of being unfriendly. Months have passed without a sign of change, save the possible institution of a system of microscopic examination in detail, which will necessarily be almost, if not quite, as prohibitory by its delays as is the decree itself. That system has been repeatedly tried elsewhere, and to some extent in this country, always to be abandoned. In Chicago, after a fruitless examination of ten thousand slaughtered animals in the search for trichinæ, it was deemed better to trust to the general protection to be derived from feeding clean, wholesome food, choosing the best breeds of swine, taking care in the selection of those slaughtered, and skill in the handling and curing, than to endure the destructive delays of a microscopic examination of each piece or each animal, which even then did not reach absolute certainty unless every part of each was subjected to the process.

The Congress of the United States is about to assemble, and this government must make some answer to the demand which the public mind is already formulating for defense of home interests. Before that time arrives, I seize this occasion to again appeal to the judgment of the French Government, with which we are so closely united by inherited friendship, by similarity of institutions, and by community of interest.

Accept, &c.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have this day forwarded a note to Count Limburg-Stirum, acting minister of foreign affairs, in reference to the case of Jacques Loeb, of which I inclose a copy.

Although there is little doubt that the German Government will bring Loeb's case under its recent decision in regard to the non-applicability of the treaties of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine, I have not felt warranted in so far acquiescing in their interpretation as to desist from sending in applications of this kind.

It seems to me that in view of any future negotiations, it would be a mistake to be silent, and so to appear to consent to their doctrine on this subject.

I have, &c.,

Mr. White to Count Limburg Stirum.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, November 4, 1880.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to call the attention of his excellency Count Limburg Stirum, acting minister of foreign affairs, to the case of Jacques Loeb, a citizen of the United States.

According to Mr. Loeb's statements he was born in Reichshofen, Alsace-Lorraine, on the 31st March, 1855, emigrated to the United States in August, 1872, and was naturalized there 30th June, 1879, as is shown by the accompanying certificate of naturalization, the ultimate return of which is respectfully requested.

It further appears that the said Loeb returned to his native place in the summer of the present year, was arrested by the authorities there, but was released on exhibition of his American citizen paper.

The payment of a fine of 600 marks for avoidance of military duty was then demanded by the authorities, who informed Loeb that he could apply for a pardon which would free him from this fine. This Loeb states that he did, but received an unfavorable reply to his petition since his return to America, where he now is.

The undersigned brings these statements to the notice of his excellency Count Limburg-Stirum, hoping that in the present case an annoying fine may, if the facts prove to be as stated, be removed from an American citizen who showed his bona fides by only remaining in Germany a few weeks on a visit to his native place, instead of claiming to remain two years under the treaty of 1868, as interpreted by the German Government in all cases previous to October, 1880.

The undersigned avails himself, &c.,

AND. D. WHITE.

No. 155.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 13, 1880.

SIR: The accompanying copy of a dispatch, with its inclosures, received from the United States legation at Honolulu, under date of July 5, 1880, will acquaint you with the efforts being made by Chief Lebon, and seconded by the Evangelical Mission Associations of the Pacific, to check the sale of intoxicating liquors, by foreigners, to the inhabitants of the Ralik group of islands in the Marshall Archipelago.

This extensive group is understood to be under no foreign flag or protectorate, and to feel no foreign influence other than that of the resident consular officer, a German, and of the distant consular representations at Samoa and Fiji, within the jurisdiction of which the Ralik Islands seem to fall.

The ordinance of the chief, Lebon, copied as an annex to Mr. Comly's dispatch, seems to be of a character which foreign governments have heretofore signally supported, and even assisted in enacting, in their intercourse with the simple natives of the Pacific. It prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors by a foreigner to a native of the Ralik or other independent islands of that region, and punishes the offender by a fine of $100 for the first offense, and banishment from the group for the second. So far as the mere acquiescence of this government in the enforcement of the ordinance is concerned, nothing need be said in its favor, and the politics and humane legislation of the Ralik chief is cordially supported by us.

Something more than mere acquiescence is, however, required, and in the present want of consular representation of the United States in the Ralik group, through which to exert a visible influence in seconding the wise endeavors of Chief Lebon, this government deems it proper to call upon the good offices of the only power which is at present understood to maintain a consular post in those islands subordinate to the principal oceanian establishment at Samoa, and to express its hope that the German consular officer at Jaluit will be instructed to lend all proper aid to the native government of the Raliks for the enforcement of this proper and unfortunately necessary ordinance against all foreigners of whatever nationality who may unlawfully sell intoxicating liquors to natives.

Instructions have been sent to the United States consul at Apia, in the Samoan Islands, to obtain the co-operation of his German and British colleagues in this sense, pending the contemplated appointment of a representative of this government at Jaluit.

In communicating this request to the German Government you will see the advisability of making no official reference to the alleged complicity of the German consul, through the business house of which he is a member, in keeping up the abuse which Chief Lebon's ordinance aims to check. You may, however, allude to it as a fact known to this Department should you have occasion to converse with the minister for foreign affairs on the subject.

REICHSHOFEN, ALSACE, November 5, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Through your energy and powerful help, I am happy to tell you that I gained my liberty Wednesday evening, half-past six, immediately telegraphing you to that effect.

I assure you that I am so glad that I cannot find words enough to express my sincere thanks for the noble work you have done for me.

The few American residents in this place are jubilant over your success.

In the mean time receive my high esteem and everlasting thanks.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, November 8, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of the 7th instant, I cannot advise you regarding damages in your case; you will be the best judge of that. I can only state that should you file a statement in this legation it will be presented at such time and in such manner as the Department of State may direct.

I must also leave your conduct under the existing circumstances to your own judgment. Since the German Government now holds that its treaties of 1868 do not apply to Alsace-Lorraine the whole question is entirely unsettled, and will be discussed at some indefinite time in the future. Under these circumstances your remaining in Alsace-Lorraine would seem to be a matter of serious risk, and it becomes a question whether it would not be better for you, instead of continuing your residence there, to return to the country of your adoption and take up the duties of citizenship which have been conferred upon you, but which it would appear you have never begun to exercise, you having left America for your old home almost immediately after you were naturalized. This, as stated in my former letter, adds to the difficulty of your case, creating not unnaturally a prejudice against you among the German authorities.

The same uncertainty which exists in regard to other matters extends to your fine of 600 marks. But my belief is that if you, practically and bona fide, return to your duties as an American citizen you will hear no more of it.

Your papers have been asked for by the legation, and will doubtless be returned to you. But in the regular course of things it will require some considerable time for them to reach Berlin and from the foreign office to arrive at the legation, which has not yet even received official notification of your release.

No. 4.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor, referring to previous correspondence in the military case of Aaron Weill, to inform you that the acting minister of foreign affairs, under date of the 19th instant, informs the legation that Aaron Weill's fine and costs have been remitted by a pardon in the usual way, which will definitely end this case.

Also, under date of the 20th November, the legation is informed by the foreign office that Alvis Gehres, whose case is referred to in dispatches 86, of 2d February, and 119, of 4th May, likewise a citizen originally from Alsace-Lorraine, has been pardoned for his alleged violation of military duty.

I venture to think, therefore, with these two cases as precedents that no further difficulty will be made by the German Government in the settlement of sound cases of returning Alsacians, and that the refusal to extend the benefit of the treaty of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine originated in that province, and has not been indorsed by the ministry of state in Berlin.

No. 161.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 1, 1880.

SIR: Referring to your recent dispatches in regard to the arrest of American naturalized citizens in Germany charged with owing military service there, I have to inform you that the frequency of the application for the intervention of this government in such cases has become a source of deep concern to this Department. Independently of the distress and annoyance which these frequent arrests occasion to the individuals so arrested, they are the cause of great anxiety to German naturalized citizens desiring to revisit their native country either for purposes of business or pleasure.

In view of the friendly disposition which the Imperial German Government has manifested in promptly and satisfactorily settling the cases which have lately arisen, particularly those of Weill and Gehres, the present is deemed a favorable opportunity to bring this subject to the attention of that government, by informing it that the early and favorable consideration given by it to the above-mentioned cases has afforded this Department reason to hope that the Imperial German Government may now be disposed to adopt some general rule for the disposition of these cases which might relieve both governments from the embarrassment which is now brought upon them by the frequent recurrence of the arrests of American citizens in Germany.

In view of the friendly spirit with which the Imperial German Government has always considered complaints upon this subject, and its prompt and favorable action in relation to them, it seems to this Department that it may be possible that these arrests may often occur in consequence of the overzealous action of subordinate authorities; and that, if such is the case, the German Imperial Government, in its wisdom, might prevent many vexatious and unnecessary arrests of American citizens by a general order on the subject. In the opinion of this Department it is highly inexpedient for the two powers to be continually engaged in the settlement of cases which involve no disputed legal questions and no facts which could not, in most cases, be satisfactorily ascertained without the necessity of first making arrests.

I have, therefore, to instruct you to bring this subject to the attention of the imperial foreign office at an early day, with the view of securing the adoption by the German Government of such general rules upon the subject in question as may, so far as practicable, prevent the unnecessary arrest of American citizens in Germany.

No. 7.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, December 9, 1880. (Received December 27.)

SIR: Availing myself of the opportunity offered by the presentation of the President's letters to the Emperor inclosed in your instruction No. 156, of the 16th November, I had yesterday an interview with his excellency Count Limburg-Stirum, acting minister of foreign affairs.

His excellency then alluded to the Alsace-Lorraine question and his interview with Mr. White on that subject, which was reported to you in dispatch No. 151, of the 21st September.

In reference to the application of the treaty of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine, his excellency repeated that the German Government could not, and would not, admit it, and should, on principle, give that answer to every communication regarding our military cases in Alsace from the legation; also, that the practical difficulty in these cases was that the officials of Alsace-Lorraine were acting in accordance with the laws of that province, and that it was only by the general government setting aside those laws that the cases of returning American emigrants could be favorably decided.

When I suggested that the question of the treaty need not be raised as long as the cases were decided favorably to us, as they always had been, his excellency said that we must not depend upon that, as there might come a case which would not be so decided. He, however, said that his government would be very glad to bring this state of things to an end, and would meet the American Government half way if the first proposal came from us for a supplementary convention or agreement to extend the treaty of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine without going through the trouble of making a new general treaty, which they did not desire. I asked the count if such a matter would have to be laid before the Reichstag for confirmation, but on this point he was not quite sure, as he had not considered it.

His excellency said that instructions to this effect had been sent to Mr. Von Schlözer at Washington, in case our government should prefer to arrange the matter there, and that he himself had told Mr. White the same thing in his interview of the 20th September.

On referring to Mr. White's dispatch of the 21st September, I notice he uses the words "additional treaty" as what the German Government desires, but at my interview of yesterday I derived the impression that their desire was for something only formal enough to be binding which would raise no debates or discussions, and could be arranged by the German minister at Washington or the American minister at Berlin without extra powers. Should my impression be correct, Mr. Von Schlözer would undoubtedly confirm it, and the present time, when there are no Alsace cases in dispute, would seem to be a very favorable one in which to avail ourselves of this conciliatory disposition, and of the approaching meeting of the Reichstag, in case the final approval of that body is required.

Such an arrangement implies on our part a tacit admission, at any rate, that the present treaty does not apply to Alsace-Lorraine, but, inasmuch as there has not been a unanimous agreement of our Secretaries of State or of our ministers here on that point, and as it might be convenient in some future emergency to have the opposite view in regard to other treaties to fall back upon—there being no rule of international law on the extension of existing treaties to newly-acquired territory—perhaps it is for our interest to concede this point, which would probably not be raised by the German Government after negotiations were once set on foot.

Mr. Everett to Mr. Evarts.

No. 10.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, December 20, 1880. (Received January 7, 1881.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your instruction No. 161 of the 1st instant, in reference to the troublesome cases of fine or imprisonment which occur here.

In my dispatch No. 7, of the 9th instant, I informed you of my interview with Count Limburg-Stirum at which this subject was discussed, and in which, I believe, I brought forward all the points mentioned in your dispatch No. 161 in as conciliatory a manner as I could. The most satisfactory reply that I succeeded in obtaining was that the German Government was ready to receive proposals from the American Government for a convention to extend the existing treaty to Alsace-Lorraine, but that the cases heretofore decided favorably must not be considered as influencing future cases, though up to August of this year every Alsace-Lorraine case of any merit had been decided in our favor.

As a fact, there are now six cases of fine against emigrants from Alsace-Lorraine, which have been decided adversely under this new ruling, but as all the parties except one are safely in the United States, and the fines will eventually expire by limitation, the legation has not thought it worth while to speak to the foreign office again concerning them until the understanding about Alsace-Lorraine was on a little better footing.

In Prussia proper, and the other States included in the treaty, it is undoubtedly true, as suggested in your instruction, and as the legation has repeatedly told the foreign office, that arrests occur owing to the over-zealousness of local officials, and in disregard of the ministerial circulars appended to the treaty. As far as the legation is aware, there are no such ministerial circulars for Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, or Hesse, and consequently the officials in those States not unfrequently state that they are not obliged to obey the decrees of the Prussian ministers.

In many cases, also, the trials and punishments are under the authority of the military courts on the charge of military delinquency, and such cases would not, at any rate, be reported to the ministers of justice or the Interior, who issued the above-mentioned decrees. The foreign office has been frequently urged by the legation to restrain officials from carrying out judgments before reporting them to headquarters, and it is probable from the diminution of cases in the North German Confederation that this has been done.

The recent decision of the foreign office was brought out by a note from Mr. White, asking categorically whether the ministerial decrees appended to the treaty applied to Alsace-Lorraine, and, if not, what instructions had been issued to the officials of that district. The reply came back that even the treaty did not extend to Alsace-Lorraine, and that ten years absence was necessary to release an emigrant from his duties to his original country.

While, on the one hand, this is an annoying decision for such emigrants as have not been prepared for it, it has the advantage that after a ten years' absence the returning emigrant is on the footing of any other American and has an unlimited right of sojourn, instead of only two years' visit, as provided for by the treaty.

Apparently, Count Limburg-Stirum's reason for not wishing to interfere in the Alsace-Lorraine case was that he had to override the local laws of Alsace-Lorraine in doing so, but inasmuch as those laws were made subsequently to the treaty, and probably with the full knowledge at the time that they would conflict with it, the simplest way to remove the present difficulties would seem to be to alter the laws of Alsace-Lorraine in so far as they apply to naturalized Americans and conflict with the treaty.

But from my conversation with Count Limburg-Stirum I judged that no such suggestion would be entertained until a formal convention for extending the treaty to Alsace-Lorraine had been signed. It is difficult to understand why, if the German Government are, as they say, willing to extend the treaty to Alsace-Lorraine, they do not so extend it without more ado and without any convention.

It seems to be the opinion of the friends of the United States here, who are familiar with the negotiations which passed at the time of the Bancroft treaty, that the United States would gain nothing now, and might lose all by touching the existing treaty, even with the idea of extending it to the whole of Germany; that such a measure would never pass the Bundesrath and Reichstag, and that it would be better to trust to negotiations in each case as it occurs. This opinion has been expressed to me in connection with recent reports in the newspapers that a bill had been introduced in our Congress for the abrogation of the Bancroft treaty.

I will avail myself of the earliest opportunity to urge the views contained in your instructions No. 161 on the foreign office.

I will thank you to communicate to the Imperial German Government the information contained in the accompanying papers as to the progress which has been made by the authorities of Pennsylvania in the prosecution of the individuals concerned in the sale of spurious diplomas. One of the inclosed documents is an affidavit made by John Buchanan, in which he sets forth that the diploma issued to Paul E. C. Volland, of Prussia, was issued to him in violation of the laws of Pennsylvania and the charter of the so-called "American University of Philadelphia," Volland never having attended lectures in said institution. This affidavit, together with the copy of the record of the proceedings in the court of common pleas of Philadelphia County, which resulted in abolishing the charter of the "American University of Philadelphia," you may transmit to the foreign office for the use of the German authorities in the prosecution which is still pending, as is understood here, against Volland.

In reply, I have to inform you that this Department fully approves of Mr. White's action in reference to Mr. Loeb's case, and, moreover, heartily concurs in the view expressed by the minister that this government cannot assent to the doctrine of the non-applicability of the treaties of 1868 to Alsace-Lorraine. SIR: Referring to your instruction No. 161 of the 1st ultimo, requesting the minister to call the attention of the imperial foreign office to the question of the arrest of American citizens in Germany, I have the honor to inform you that I lost no time after the return of Count Limburg-Stirum from his Christmas vacation to call at the foreign office and present in person a copy of the substance of the above instruction, which his excellency allowed me to read to him.

In reply, his excellency pleaded the difficulty in distinguishing between the bona fide and dishonest returning emigrant, and repeated what his predecessors have said as to its being the duty of local officials to refer all cases to their chiefs in Berlin. This I assured his excellency had not been done in any of the cases coming to the legation, as far as we could ascertain, and that our experience was that, in the cases where the circular copy of the naturalization treaty and ministerial decrees had been forwarded to the persons in trouble by the legation, that this was the first knowledge which the officials had of these documents, and that though they sometimes expressed their indifference to them, yet we had reason to suppose that occasionally our circular was the cause of the freedom of Americans from further annoyance. I stated that this had been found to be the case even in Berlin, and not merely in remote provincial towns. His excellency said that all officials whom it concerned were supposed to be furnished with a copy of the treaty and decrees, and that he would cause the matter to be investigated, and a reply sent to the legation in the same courteous and friendly spirit in which your instruction was worded.

As regards such arrests and cases as occurred in Alsace-Lorraine, his excellency said that previous cases of leniency must not be used as test cases, as his government must still insist that the naturalization treaty does not apply to Alsace-Lorraine; that the German Government had already, both through its minister at Washington and our minister here, offered to receive proposals for a supplementary convention to extend the existing treaty to Alsace-Lorraine, and that until some reply from the American Government had been received to that offer matters must remain as they were, as it was not for the interest of the German Government to alter them.

In reply to my question whether it would not be possible by a general order of the Imperial Government, as suggested in your instruction, to modify the local laws of Alsace-Lorraine so far as they applied to returning Americans, his excellency said that he could not give any answer to that question until an answer was received to his proposal for a supplementary treaty, which the German Government considered the simplest way of meeting the numerous difficulties of the situation.

For your further information I will add that there are at present six cases in Alsace-Lorraine decided adversely to us, and three awaiting decision, besides two cases of fine not in Alsace-Lorraine still undecided.

[Extract.]

No. 182.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, February 21, 1881. (Received March 9.)

SIR: The opening of the Imperial Parliament (Reichstag) took place on the 15th instant. Very little interest was manifested in the ceremony itself, since neither the Emperor nor the Chancellor took part in it.

But upon the speech from the throne very general attention was concentrated. It was expected to contain a programme for a new system of dealing with taxation and labor throughout the empire, of which the public has heard much for some time past. Intimations as to the immediate future of Europe, whether peaceful or warlike, were also looked for.

As to the general concerns of Europe, the speech was neither full nor clear, yet, on the whole, indicated expectations of peace.

As to the internal affairs of the empire, public expectation was more than realized. Bills were announced of the greatest importance to the millions concerned, and of deep interest to all students of politics throughout the world. For the idea which underlies and permeates them all is socialistic; the idea that the advancement of the laboring classes is to be left not merely or mainly to individual foresight or energy, but to society as a whole, acting through its constituted authorities. These bills are presented with the express declaration that the Imperial Government thus begins to redeem the promise made at the introduction of the law for the repression of socialist excesses in October, 1878—a promise to prepare measures for the relief of the working classes. On this point the speech lays stress in more than one passage.

These measures, which seem generally considered as only a first installment, involve relieving the working classes of direct taxation, the creation of a system of guilds or trade corporations, a change in the laws regarding crimes committed during intoxication; but, above all, a system under which the state shall insure certain large classes of workmen throughout the empire, in view of disability or death, the premiums to be collected in stated proportions by government officials from employers, employed, and sundry local boards.

Of course, this cannot strictly be called the beginning of government upon the socialistic theory, since we have already seen here the absorption of the railways by the Prussian State, and various other measures clearly based on the theory that "that government is best which governs most;" but it is clearly the beginning of a new stage in the practical development of the theory, a development which I am assured, after talking with many of the most noted statesmen and thinkers of the empire, will go on logically to embrace all workmen under a State insurance scheme, which would seem to have no logical end short of that which the extreme socialists have advocated as the "organization of labor."

These projects will no doubt meet with much opposition and be considerably amended, but the expectation generally is that, in their main features, they will become law. It has been thought by many that Bavaria would declare against them, but the recent speech of the Bavarian minister, President Lütz, seems to indicate ultimate acquiescence in the national insurance scheme by the second of the leading German states. With Prussia and Bavaria acting together, there is little indeed to be feared from the lesser governments.

Whatever may be the value of the other parts of the plan, that which proposes to remove the taxation from working classes, will hardly gain universal applause, since the result is arrived at, not by retrenchment either of military or civil expenditure, but by substituting indirect for direct taxes.

* * * * * * *

Any one who has studied at all thoughtfully the chancellor's idea of government can hardly fail of the conclusion that these measures are the legitimate result of a certain theory which he has long cherished. Its germs lie in his character, and they have been developed not only by his own reasoning, but by that of his most intimate advisers. This theory appears to be simply that the empire must thrust its roots down among the working classes; that it must draw support from their most cherished interests and hopes; and that all classes must be impressed more and more with the idea that provision both for their own present wants and for the future wants of their families depends first of all upon the stability of the central government.

I inclose a translation of the Imperial speech, and of the national insurance bill; also the original text of the same in full, with annotations.

I have, &c.,

AND. D. WHITE.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 182.—Translation.]

Speech from the throne.

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: His Majesty the Emperor and King has been graciously pleased to commission me to open the sittings of the Reichstag.

The imperial budget to be laid before you without delay will enable you to review the results hitherto yielded by the tax reform inaugurated two years ago, and still further promised by it. In the economic and financial outcome thus far reached the allied governments view an appeal to proceed further in applying the fundamental idea of that reform, so as in this way not only to bring about the financial independence of the empire, but also to put within the reach of the Federal States further means of reconstituting their taxation system, of alleviating pressing burdens, and of bettering the lot of the working classes. How much the imperial treasury can already hand over to the separate States for these purposes will only be apparent on the surpluses from the new customs being definitely ascertained. Even now, however, the allied governments believe it their duty to aim at the increase of the revenue to be applied to such objects by a new stamp law and brewing-tax arrangement.

Already at the opening of the Imperial Parliament, in February, 1879, His Majesty the Emperor, referring to the (socialist) law of the 21st of October, 1878, expressed the hope that the Reichstag would not refuse its further co-operation in the path of legislation for the cure of social evils. The remedy, however, will not have to be exclusively applied in the shape of an effort to repress Socialist excesses, but will also have to be equally sought for in a positive attempt to promote the welfare of the laboring classes, and in this respect care for the indigent and the incapable must occupy a prominent place. In the interest of those His Majesty the Emperor has primarily caused to be laid before the federal council a workingman's accident assurance bill, aiming at meeting a want equally felt by laborer and labor-giver. His Majesty the Emperor hopes that this will be approved in principle by the allied governments and welcomed by the Imperial Parliament as complement to the legislation directed against the tendencies of social democracy. The provisions hitherto in force for protecting laboring men from the perilous consequences of incapacity to work, resulting from accidents or helpless age, have proved to be insufficient, and this inadequacy has contributed not a little to induce members of this class to seek means of relief in assisting the efforts of social democracy.

In the same stage, too, and in a closely related region, there is a bill calculated to regulate the constitution of the guilds by affording means for organizing the isolated powers of persons engaged in the same trade and forming them into corporate societies, thus raising their economic capacity as well as their social and moral efficiency.

On repeated occasions has the Reichstag expressed the wish that the survivors of imperial officials should be provided for by law, and in conformity therewith a bill will be laid before you in favor of the widows and orphans of those public servants.

A very considerable increase in the number of crimes and offenses committed in a state of drunkenness, and thus at present beyond the reach of criminal chastisement, has necessitated an extension of the existing penal code, and a bill to this effect will therefore be placed before you for approval.

Some changes in the constitution aiming at the establishment of biennial budget periods had already been submitted to you in the previous session, and as the allied governments are now, as formerly, under the weight of difficulties inseparable from the annual and simultaneous sitting of Imperial and Provincial Parliaments, they will again lay before you the undisposed of bill.

With the Governments of Greece and Brazil negotiations are pending for the conclusion of consular conventions. I hope that this will be achieved in the course of the session, and that before its close your approval of these treaties will be obtained.

In all foreign states the German Empire is in the enjoyment of peaceful and benevolent relations, and in particular our political attitude to the great empires our neighbors corresponds to the friendship which personally knits His Majesty the Emperor to the rulers thereof. Among the European powers there prevails not only a full agreement of their will to preserve peace, but also no theoretical difference of opinion as to the essential aims of the negotiations now pending between them. I am therefore empowered to give expression to the trust of His Majesty the Emperor that the unity of the powers will succeed in preventing even partial breaches of the peace in Europe, or, at any rate, so limit them as that they neither affect Germany nor its neighbors.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 182.—Translation.]

Project of a law in regard to the insurance of the workmen employed in mines, manufactories, and other industries, against the results of accidents happening to them in consequence of their employment.

We, William, by the grace of God Emperor of Germany and King of Prussia, decree, in the name of the Empire, with the approval of the Federal Council and Parliament, as follows:

§ 1. All the workmen and employés in mines, salines, reducing establishments, quarries, excavations, docks, the construction of buildings, building yards, manufactories, and smelting works, whose yearly wages or salary is not over 2,000 marks, are by the provisions of this law to be insured against the consequences of accidents occurring in their employment, by an insurance institution to be established by the government and managed on its account.

To the above-mentioned, belong by the terms of this law those employments also in which steam boilers or machinery moved by natural forces (such as water, steam, gas, hot-air, &c.) come into use, with the exception of ships and railways, as also that class of works in which a machine not belonging to the workshop is only temporarily used.

Under wages or salary. in the meaning of this law, are included percentage of profit and payment in kind. The value of the latter is to be estimated according to the local market price. The value of yearly work, so far as it is not regulated by the total of the fixed weekly sums, is three hundred times the daily wages.

§ 2. The imperial insurance office has its location and headquarters at Berlin. Complaints of insurance management can be brought against the office according to the choice of the insured, either before the competent court of the seat of the institution, or of the seat of the branch office which has negotiated the business.

§ 3. The organization and administration of the imperial insurance office will be, so far as this law does not provide any regulations therefor, governed by rules fixed by the Emperor in co-operation with the Federal Council (Bundesrath).

Those rules especially apply to the following points:

1. The composition and duties of the managing board.
2. The proper offices and their functions to be opened in connection with the circuits of the higher administrative authorities.
3. The formation of a reserve fund.
4. The administration and investment of the cash funds, and especially of the reserve fund.
5. The principles according to which the yearly accounts are to be made up, and the auditing of them.
6. The publication of the balance-sheets.
7. The form of the announcements to be made by the office and in what papers they are to be published.

§ 4. The tariffs and conditions of insurance will, in so far as this law does not provide for them, be determined by the Federal Council (Bundesrath).

The tariffs must undergo a revision every five years at least.

§ 5. The object of the insurance is a compensation for the injury which results from a bodily wound producing an incapacity for work of more than four weeks, or death.

§ 6. The compensation to the insured in case of injury shall consist of—

1. The cost of the medical treatment from the beginning of the fifth week after the occurrence of the accident.

2. A payment to be made to the injured person from the beginning of the fifth week after the occurrence of the accident for the duration of his incapacity for work.

This is to be reckoned according to the amount of the average wages which the injured person has received during the time of his labor on the works where the accident occurred.

If his services have lasted longer than a year, then the average wages of the last year are to serve as a basis.

The compensation is to consist—

a. In case of entire incapacity for work and for the duration of it of 66⅔ per cent. of the wages.

b. In case of partial incapacity for work and for the duration of it a fraction of the income under "a," which is to be measured by the amount of remaining capacity of not less than 25 per cent. and not more than 50 per cent. of the full wages.

§ 7. The compensation to the insured in case of death shall consist of—

1. Ten per cent of the yearly wages as compensation for costs of burial.

2. In case of death later than four weeks after the accident, the cost of the medical treatment after the expiration of that period, and aid to be granted during the further time of his illness to the amount of 66⅔ per cent. of the previous pay.

3. A payment to be made to the survivors of the deceased from the date of death, and to be estimated according to the terms of § 2, No. 2, clauses 2 and 3.

This amounts to—

a. For the widow of the deceased until her death or her remarriage, 20 per cent. of his wages; for each surviving child of the marriage with the deceased until the completion of its fifteenth year, 10 per cent. of the wages, which, however, must not exceed 50 per cent. of the wages.

b. For every motherless orphan, as also for every orphan whose mother marries again, during the period up to the completion of their fifteenth year, 10 per cent., but for all the children together not more than 50 per cent. of the wages.

c. For the ascendants of the deceased, if he was their only support, 20 per cent. of the wages until their death, or until the necessity for it ceases.

If there are several claimants under the above c, then compensation will accrue to parents before grandparents and to male claimants before female ones.

If the claimants under c conflict with those under a and b, then the claim of the former is only valid so far as the maximum amount of the compensation has not been claimed by the latter.

§ 8. Any claims which the insured have against registered aid societies or other societies insuring against illness, death, or incapacity suffer no prejudice through the terms of the compensation in the preceding § § 6 and 7.

Provincial regulations under which such societies are required to give assistance to injured workmen or their survivors become inoperative when the provisions of this law apply in the case.

§ 9. For every industry included in § 1 a collective insurance covering the persons employed in it must be taken out by the payment of a fixed premium, which is to be estimated every quarter by the amount of wages or salary paid during the past quarter to the persons employed.

§ 10. The rates of premium for the different kinds of work, according to the classes of danger, are to be based on a percentage of the wages or salary; so that the costs of the management of the insurance office, in addition to the payment of the compensation, will be covered by the premiums.

§ 11. The premiums are to be paid:

1. For those of the insured whose earnings (according to § 6, No. 2, clause 4) amount to 750 marks and under, two-thirds by those for whose account the work is done, one-third by the local poor board (§ 5 of the law concerning the location of charities of 6th June, 1870) in whose district the work is situated, so far as no other association has been legally substituted for it by one of the Federal States.

2. For those of the insured whose earnings amount to over 750 marks, one-half by those on whose account the work is done; one-half by the insured.

§ 12. The insurance is to be effected by the board of management of the local poor board or by the Federal State which has (according to § 11) to pay the premium.

For this purpose the responsible persons of every work existing in their district at the time of the taking effect of this law, as also of every work newly started after this date, must, within a delay of four weeks, make a declaration to the proper managing officer of the Imperial Insurance Company, giving the locality of the work and the amount of the salary or wages paid at the time.

Upon the sending of this declaration to the proper branch office the insurance is considered concluded.

The local poor boards or the respective Federal States are thereupon furnished with a certificate in duplicate, which includes the description of the work and the rate of premium fixed for it, one copy of which is given to the contractor of the work.

§ 13. An appeal to the decision of the higher authorities against the amount of premium which has been assessed can be made within fourteen days from the issue of the certificate by the parties responsible for the premium. This decision has no retarding effect.

The decision of the higher authorities is limited to the question whether the classification of the kinds of danger by the Federal Council has been rightfully applied in the disputed case.

Further measures against the assessment of the premium are impossible.

A refusal of insurance can be opposed under the corresponding application of the regulations contained in clauses 1 and 4.

§ 14. The amount of the premium reckoned according to the rate fixed, and the amount of the wages and salaries for every industry in the district which is insured, must be sent by the managers of the local poor board or the Federal State to the proper officer of the imperial insurance office within four weeks after the end of every quarter, inclosed with a statement concerning the persons employed during the past quarter on the said works, and the wages and salaries received by them, which are to be given according to the forms to be furnished for the purpose by the imperial insurance office.

A receipt is to be given for the payment thus made.

§ 15. The contractors of the works are required:

1. To make a declaration concerning every work in operation at the time of the going into effect of this law, as also of every one begun since then which would come under § 1 of this law, within fourteen days, giving the nature of the work, the number of persons employed on it for wages or salary at that time.

2. Within fourteen days after the end of each quarter they are to pay in the quota of the premium due from them and the persons employed by them, inclosing a calculation of the latter as given in the form mentioned under § 14.

3. To report within fourteen days any changes in the plan or object of the work which affect the classification of the kinds of danger.

The declarations and payments prescribed in Nos. 1, 2, 3 are to be sent in to the communal authorities of the place where the work is situated unless the provincial central authorities designate some other officers for the purpose, and are to be forwarded by the latter within the time specified by the provincial central authorities to the direction of the local poor board or the proper officers of the particular Federal State.

§ 16. The contractors of the work are entitled to charge the amount of the premium which the persons employed by them have to pay against the amount of wages or salary earned by them when their wages or salary is paid.

This calculation is based upon the wages or salary paid in the course of the quarter for which the premium is to be paid on the bases of an estimate to be furnished for the inspection of all the parties interested.

§ 17. Amounts of premium in arrears will be collected in the same way as communal taxes.

§ 18. If an insured work is discontinued, then the contractor, within eight days, must announce it to the authorities designated in § 15, and the latter must within a further space of eight days announce it to the proper administrative officer. Simultaneously with the notification the amount of the premium for the time since the end of the last quarter, calculated by weeks, must be paid in, accompanied with an account. Every week begun is considered as completed.

Whoever does not properly conform to the requirements in giving notice is held responsible by the imperial insurance office for such amount of premium as he would have had to pay if the work had lasted until the supplementary notice in the course of the last quarter.

§ 19. The imperial insurance office has the right, through authorized agents, to verify the contractor's calculation of the premium when based on correct grounds, and for this purpose to inspect on the premises their business books, in which the payments of wages and salary are kept. The contractors are obliged to lay before the agents of the imperial insurance office the said business books for their inspection.

The persons intrusted with this inspection must make oath to impart facts which come to their knowledge in the inspection to no one except the superior officers of the imperial insurance office.

§ 20. Written notification from the contractor or his lawful representative is to be given to the local police of every accident happening in the insured work, through which any person employed on the same is killed or suffers bodily injury which will probably result in incapacity for work of more than four weeks, or in death.

This notice must, if the work is situated in a city of more than 2,000 inhabitants, follow at the latest within two or at most three days after the moment when the responsible person has knowledge of the death or the injury.

This notice can be furnished for the contractor by the person who has charge at the time of the accident of the work or the part of the work where the accident happens.

The form and contents of the announcement will be decided by the imperial chancellor.

§ 21. The superintendents of the works which are under the direction of the imperial and state authorities must notify their superior officers.

§ 22. The local police authorities, and in the case of § 21 the proper superior authorities, must send in as soon as possible to the higher civil authorities the notice of the accident which has reached them, with an abstract of the details of the same in an accident register kept by them, and at the same time to inform the proper administrative authorities of the imperial insurance office of the accident.

§ 23. Each accident brought to their notice is as soon as possible to be subjected to an examination by the local police authorities, by which is to be ascertained—

1. The cause and nature of the accident.
2. The killed or injured persons.
3. The nature of the resulting injuries.
4. The place of abode of the injured person.
5. The survivors of the persons killed by the accident who can under § 7 of this law claim compensation for injuries.

The imperial insurance office and the persons responsible under § 11, No. 1, for the payment of the premium can, either by proxy or in person, be present at the investigation. For this purpose timely notice is to be given them of the time appointed for it. Also, as far as possible, other participants and experts are to be summoned on the order of the imperial insurance office and at its expense.

To all persons interested an inspection is allowed of the protocols taken at the investigation, as also of other proceedings, and on demand a copy of the same by paying for it.

It is obligatory on the officers superintending the works indicated in § 21 to conduct the investigation according to the foregoing regulations:

§ 24. If insured persons are killed in an accident, then the competent officers of the Imperial Insurance Company, immediately after the close of the investigation (§ 23), or in case death supervenes, as soon as they have the knowledge of it, shall occupy themselves with the fixing of the compensation.

If the accident only resulted in the wounding of insured persons, then after the lapse of four weeks from the accident the fixing of the compensation for such wounded persons who are then entirely or partially unable to earn their living is to be attended to.

For those injured persons who, after the lapse of four weeks, are still under medical treatment the fixing of the compensation to be given is to be limited to the time until the end of the cure, but is not to be settled until the end of the cure.

§ 25. Claimants of compensation for whom compensation has not been officially fixed must send their claims, to avoid exclusion, before the end of a year after the accident, to the competent officers of the imperial insurance office.

If the claim for compensation is allowed, then the amount of compensation is to be at once settled, otherwise the claim for compensation must be refused in writing.

Rejected claims for compensation are barred if there has been no attempt to establish them judicially within three months after the delivery of the refusal.

§ 26. The police authorities are required at the request of the imperial insurance office to seek out such facts as would affect the fixing the proper compensation and the amount of the same.

§ 27. The contractors by whom the killed or injured persons were employed at the time of the accident are obliged to furnish to the imperial insurance office on their demand a summary of the wages or salary earned by the same during the time of their employment, or, in case this has lasted more than one year, for the last year.

§ 28. The imperial insurance office must send to every person entitled to compensation a written notice showing the amount of compensation to be delivered by the proper police authorities, from which the amount of the compensation and the manner of its calculation can be seen. In the case of compensation for injured persons who have become incapable of work, it must be expressly stated in which category this incapacity for work exists.

§ 29. The decisions of the imperial insurance office as regards these questions can be contested by ordinary judicial proceedings. An appeal is barred after three months from the delivery of the notice of the decision.

§ 30. After the definite settlement of the compensation a certificate must be sent to the beneficiary stating the amount awarded by the imperial insurance office, with notice of the time and place of payment.

The terms of § 25, clause 1, are, however, only applicable in case of the subsequent death of the injured person. An increase of the compensation fixed in § 6 can only be demanded for the time after the notice of the higher claims.

§ 31. The imperial insurance office can either in whole or in part capitalize the compensation which is granted for incapacity for work on the demand of the person entitled to compensation and with the approval of the committee of the local poor-board in whose district he resides, or, in the absence of this, of the competent provincial poor-board.

With the payment of this capital all claim is extinguished to the compensation or any part of it.

§ 32. On the demand of the officials of the local poor-board in whose district the relatives of the person entitled to compensation reside, or failing this, the competent provincial poor-board, the imperial insurance office can turn over a part of the compensation of the person entitled to it to the poor-board for the benefit of those relatives as a guarantee against want, in case the person entitled to compensation fails to properly perform his legal requirements.

§ 33. Claims for compensation against the imperial insurance office, can neither be pledged, assigned, nor attached.

§ 34. All the proceedings and documents necessary for conducting the business between the imperial insurance office and the persons insured are duty and stamp free.

§ 35. If in any of the works coming under §1, for which an insurance against accidents has not been concluded by the Imperial Insurance Company, any person employed therein is killed or suffers any bodily injury which results in incapacity for work either complete or partial of more than four weeks, then the contractor is liable to the payment of the compensation fixed in §§ 6 and 7, if he cannot prove that he has properly carried out the directions contained in § 15, No. 1.

If this proof is forthcoming, then the same duty falls on the local poor-board or the Federal State, which, under § 12, was required to arrange the insurance.

As regards the fixing and paying the compensation the rules of §§ 22 to 34 are applicable.

§ 36. If an accident is caused by the gross negligence of the contractor, or in case he is not the reponsible person, of his authorized agent, or through his disobedience of the general directions given him, or other irregularities than under § 120, clause 3 of the "Gewerbe Ordnung," the contractor becomes liable for all expenses incurred by the Imperial Insurance Company under the terms of this law on account of the accident. In place of the compensation to be given in this case its capitalized value may be taken.

§ 37. For building purposes he is considered as a contractor under this law who undertakes the construction of the buildings on his own account. If the construction is transferred to him by another contractor, who has in the first place undertaken it, then is the latter responsible as contractor for the carrying out of the responsibilities falling upon the contractor under the terms of this law.

§ 38. Whoever presents an account under § 15, No. 2, or a statement under 27, made on wrong data, is, as far as there is no provision for it under § 263 of the criminal code, punishable with a fine up to 1,000 marks.

§ 39. Whoever refuses to produce his account books under § 19 will be punished with a fine up to 150 marks.

§ 40. Whoever does not fulfill the duties incumbent upon him under § 15, No. 3, and § 20, is punishable with a fine up to 100 marks.

§ 41. Whoever does not furnish the notice demanded by § 15, No. 1, or the estimate demanded in No. 2, within the prescribed space of time, is punishable with a fine up to 50 marks.

§ 42. The § 2, of the law of 7 June, 1871, concerning compensation for injuries to those who are killed or wounded in the workshops of railways, mines, manufactories, &c., has no longer force as regards injuries and deaths for which compensation can be given under this law.

Claims for compensation for injuries sustained through accidents in work which these persons or their survivors have on the ground of other legal ordinances, will be entertained to the extent that the persons entitled to them must regard what is owing them for the injury as their share of what would be due them under this law.

§ 43. Workmen for whom an insurance is granted for the consequences of accidents are authorized to conclude with the imperial insurance office an additional insurance on their own account.

The purpose of this insurance is the guarantee of an addition to the compensation provided for in §§ 6 and 7.

The amount of the addition is fixed by the person who takes out the insurance, but must not exceed the half of the amounts fixed in §§ 6 and 7.

The insurance premium is calculated according to the insurance tariffs prescribed by this law.

§ 44. The workmen employed in the service of others, for whom no insurance is prescribed under this law, can be insured by the imperial insurance office against the consequence of working accidents.

The object of the insurance is:

In the case of a complete or partial incapacity for work, a compensation to be paid to the injured person during the continuance of it.

In the case of death, a compensation to be paid to the survivors, designated in § 7, during the period there prescribed.

The person who takes out the insurance designates the amount of the policy, but the amount in the case of entirely incapacitated workmen shall not exceed 600 marks, or, in the case of death, 450 marks.

§ 45. By the decision of the Federal Council, the business of the Imperial Insurance Company in life insurance, for the workmen employed in the service of others, may be extended to the amount of 6,000 marks.

The extension of the business to the cases of incapacity for work from sickness or old age remains reserved for further legislative enactment.

§ 46. The tariffs for the terms contained in the preceding § § 44 and 45, clause 1, as also those in § § 43, 44, 45, clause 1, will be decided by a resolution of the Federal Council.

The insured shall, in regard to the settling of the insurances and the payments of the premiums, receive the same facilities of business which are allowed for legally necessary insurances. For this purpose employers, as also provincial and communal authorities, must take it upon themselves to act between the imperial insurance office and the insured so far as is consistent with the provisions of the insurance.

§ 47. The time at which this law will go into effect will be decided by a decree of the Emperor in agreement with the Federal Council.

No. 287.

Mr. White to Mr. Blaine.

No. 188.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, March 7, 1881. (Received March 23.)

SIR: On the 17th of November last a royal decree was issued for the establishment in Prussia of an economic council (volkswirthschaftsrath). For some time previous it was known that Prince Bismarck, as chancellor of the empire and minister president of Prussia, desired to strengthen his position as a reformer of the financial, industrial, and commercial affairs of Germany by creating a council of experts on whose freedom from party ties he could rely, and whose opinions should carry more weight in the special matters concerned than those of any mere lay members of the Prussian legislature. The royal decree in question was undoubtedly the result of this view. It opens with the statement that it is desirable to submit bills affecting commerce, manufactures, and agriculture in the first place to a council composed of persons directly interested in these subjects and possessing special technical knowledge. Such a body, it proposes, shall consist of seventy-five members called together for a session of five years. Of these, forty-five are to be selected by the ministers of trade and commerce, public works, and agriculture from among ninety persons nominated by the various chambers of commerce, manufacturing industry, and agriculture throughout Prussia. Of these forty-five, fifteen are to represent commerce, fifteen manufactures, and fifteen agriculture and forestry. The remaining thirty are to be freely selected by the above-named ministers. It is also expressly provided that fifteen of these shall be taken from among workingmen. No one can be nominated for membership who is less than thirty years of age, and any circumstances disqualifying candidates from other public bodies generally, as, for example, bankruptcy, are also to operate against membership in this.

This council is divided into three sections, one for commerce, another for manufactures, the third for agriculture and forestry, and fifteen members selected by the council, together with ten selected by the three ministers, form a permanent committee. The council can be attended by every Prussian cabinet minister or his deputy.

The ministry alone is authorized to frame the regulations of the council, decide when its sittings shall be held, and what measures shall be submitted to it in behalf of the government. Traveling expenses and fifteen marks per day are to be paid to members from the state exchequer.

It was not until January 27, or nearly twelve weeks after the promulgation of the decree, that the first meeting of the council was held in Berlin. Its members proved to be mainly wealthy and experienced merchants and manufacturers, land owners, the better class of farmers, and small but apparently prosperous master tradesmen, with some workmen. Prince Bismarck, as president of the council, delivered an address, in which he indicated the leading idea of the new institution, namely, that as the exigencies of trade prevented the interests of commerce, industry, and agriculture from being represented in Parliament in the same way and to the same extent as the interests of the learned professions, causing the former to appear there by a minority, although in reality affecting the greater part of the population, he had thought it desirable that the government, whose members are themselves surrounded by officials and men of the learned professions, should be able to obtain cool and matter-of-fact judgments, unbiased by party and political passions, directly from a central body of practical men. He also said that the community of interests throughout the whole empire suggested the desirableness of an extension of the council, and expressed the hope that the other state governments would soon join it.

At the second sitting the council began its consideration of the workingmen's insurance bill, of which I have already given you some account in my No. 182, of the 21st February. After a few unimportant changes were made in this bill it was returned to the government for ultimate transmission to the legislature.

Another bill on which the advice of the council was asked was one dealing with the reconstitution of trade-guilds. Upon this there was more difference of opinion, but it too was in the end sent back to the cabinet without having been materially changed. With the deliberations on this bill the first session of the Prussian Economic Council came to a close.

The hope expressed by Prince Bismarck that all the states of the empire might be induced to send representatives to the council, thus changing it from a Prussian into an imperial institution, seems to be approaching realization. In his capacity as chancellor of the empire he has inserted a paragraph in the budget recently submitted to the Imperial Parliament appropriating 82,000 marks for the establishment and maintenance of an imperial economic council, to be composed of one hundred and twenty-five members, and with which the Prussian council already formed is to be amalgamated. Moreover, the draft of a decree similar in principle to that issued for Prussia has just been placed before the Federal Council.

This decree declares that in the said imperial economic council Prussia shall be represented by seventy-five members, Bavaria by fifteen, Saxony by eight, Würtemberg by six, Baden by four, Hesse by three, the two Mecklenbergs by two, Oldenburg by one, the Thuringian states by three, Anhalt, Waldeck, Braunschweig, Schaunberg-Lippe, and Lippe by two, Lübeck, Bremen, and Hamburg by two, and Alsace-Lorraine by four. The appropriation for the council in the budget is calculated upon its sitting at least for twenty-one days in the year, the permanent committee holding at least forty-two sittings per year; but its terms and sittings are to be entirely under the control of the imperial government which will call the council together whenever its advice is needed. The chancellor is to be its president and the chairman of its various committees.

Hostile criticism upon the Prussian economic council comes almost entirely from the advanced liberal and progressionist parties. Their organs take the ground that it is like a packed jury, the ministers being likely to choose only men who would support their views—even government officials and other persons dependent upon the central power.

Hitherto there has been no opportunity for the expression of any opinion on the subject by the Prussian legislature, Prince Bismarck having used the royal prerogative for the creation of the council on the ground that it is not a legislative, but merely an advisory body.

But whatever may be the opinions of political parties as such, the general impression appears not unfavorable. While it seems generally thought that, as in the case of other important measures, the chancellor has by no means lost sight of the coming elections, it is believed that he is really anxious in this matter to grapple with the difficulties which beset the industry and commerce of the empire, and to avail himself of a new means to revive the prosperity of the nation by throwing more light into the problems of practical political economy, while disarming socialistic agitators by admitting to more direct influence in the state classes heretofore mainly excluded from it.

I have, &c.,

No. 191.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, March 14, 1881. (Received April 1.)

SIR: On the 17th of December last, by an instruction (No. 161 of the 1st December) referring to my recent dispatches concerning the annoyances to which naturalized American citizens returning to Germany were subjected by the military authorities, I was requested to bring the subject to the attention of the foreign office with a view to its adopting some rules which would obviate unnecessary arrests of Americans.

In my absence, Mr. Everett, as chargé d'affaires ad interim, embodied your instruction verbatim in a note to the foreign office and delivered it in person to Count Limburg-Stirum, acting minister of foreign affairs, taking advantage of the opportunity to suggest to his excellency that the experience of the legation seemed to show that the action of the local authorities frequently arose from an ignorance on their part of the ministerial decrees regarding naturalized American citizens. (See Mr. Everett's No. 10, of 20th December, 1880.)

I have now received from the foreign office a note intended to be an answer to the instruction above mentioned in which advantage is evidently taken of the use of the word "arrest" by the Department, thereby limiting very much the number of cases in which exception could be taken to the action of German officials.

The foreign office is quite correct in its statement of the rarity of arrests during the fourteen months of 1880, and 1881, referred to, but makes no allusion to the compulsory fines which occurred during the same time and which were paid to avoid immediate arrest. It is a hopeful sign that since the beginning of the present year the legation has not had to intervene once in behalf of returning American citizens. The number of such interventions in 1880 was twenty, compared with twenty-five in 1879, and twenty in 1878.

As regards the imposition of fines for neglect of military duty, the state of the case is as follows:

Every young man in Germany is liable to serve in the army on the completion of his twentieth year, and even if he emigrates before his liability to military service begins, is none the less required to report himself on the prescribed day. If he fails to do this he may be condemned in his absence to fine or imprisonment. If he has property it may be attached, the attachment, however, expiring by limitation after seven years. (See case of Ernst Eggers, foreign relations 1879, p. 369.)

In case of the return of the delinquent before such expiration the fine is at once claimed, with the alternative of imprisonment. In one case the jewelry on the man's person was seized in payment. The attachment of the real estate does not imply a sale, but only secures the payment of the fine in case the property is sold by the owner. The fears therefore of Germans in America that their property in Germany will be sold by the authorities here for military fines is unfounded. If the fine has been paid by the family of the absentee before he had become a naturalized American citizen it cannot be recovered, but otherwise in every case where bona fide American citizenship could be proved, except those in Alsace-Lorraine, the fine, whether paid or not, has been remitted by the order of the Emperor.

The legation has several times been informed by the foreign office, in justification of the summary action of the local authorities against returning Americans that the officials have no discretion as to relaxing the military laws in favor of Americans, but, at the same time, it is certain that in Prussia these officials are ordered by ministerial decrees to refer such cases to Berlin before proceeding to extremities, whenever the person can produce his American citizen paper. But some of the returning emigrants have lost this paper, some, probably, are afraid to produce it, and in some cases, it is asserted, the officials ignore it altogether, though the last possibility is denied by the foreign office. As a rule the person prosecuted has ample time, if he chooses, to appeal to the legation for protection, and in several cases where the time of grace had expired the foreign office, at the request of the legation, caused the proceedings to be stopped, by telegraph, pending investigation.

The vexed question of citizenship in Alsace-Lorraine remains in statu quo waiting for the American Government to propose a supplementary treaty regulating it. The opinion entertained by the German Government, to which I have alluded in previous dispatches, that the existing treaty is more advantageous to the United States than to Germany may be the reason why they hold that Germany should not be the first to make the proposal for its extension to Alsace-Lorraine.

I have, &c.,

AND. D. WHITE.

[Inclosure in No. 191.—Translation.]

FOREIGN OFFICE,
Berlin, March 4, 1881.

Through the esteemed note of the 10th of January last the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. And. D. White, suggested, in view of the cases of arrest of persons who had emigrated from Germany to North America, become naturalized there, and then returned to Germany for shorter or longer sojourn, the issue of some general instructions for the prevention of such arrests.

Prompted by this note the undersigned has caused an investigation to be made as to whether in reality there has of late been an accumulation of such arrests, and especially of unjust arrests.

This investigation has shown that since the beginning of the year 1880 but very few cases of the arrest within the imperial territory of persons naturalized in North America have come to the knowledge of the foreign office. It is very improbable that any such case would not have come to its knowledge.

This investigation has especially shown that Aloys Gehres, of Zinsweiler, mentioned in the esteemed note of January 10 last, as is also stated in the esteemed note of June 11 last, has hitherto not even returned to Germany; that the assertion of Otto Eick, of Bochum, and of Wendelin Frueh, of Oberhausen, in the year 1880, that they had been arrested, was, as will appear from the notes of this office of May 31 and August 10 last, found to be incorrect; that Jacques Loeb, of Reichshofen (esteemed note of November 4 last), was, immediately upon the exhibition of his certificate of naturalization, discharged from arrest; and, finally, that only Jacob Engellandt, of Breiholz, and Aaron Weill, of Reichshofen, have within the last fourteen months been arrested within the territory of the empire.

As regards Jacob Engellandt's case he had, as is stated in the note of this office of December 19 last, been guilty of desertion from German military service before his emigration, and will therefore have to suffer the penalty imposed on him. Aaron Weill was, as he still owed allegiance in Alsace-Lorraine, liable to military duty there; he had withdrawn himself from the performance of this duty, and was, as appears from the note of this office of November 19 last, only discharged from arrest and pardoned in exceptional consideration of the circumstance that he had been induced to return to Germany by information furnished him by the legation of the United States in this city.

In the former cases the arrest was in harmony with the provisions of the North German-American treaty regulating nationality of February 22, 1868; in the latter with the laws of Alsace-Lorraine, which are limited by no treaty with the United States which regulates nationality. Both arrests were therefore just.

The Imperial Government therefore cannot find in the result of the investigation sufficient grounds for the issue of any general instructions on the subject.

The undersigned, who will gladly cause the suggestion which has been made to be reconsidered, in case the envoy of the United States of America should be in a position to communicate further cases in which an arrest has of late been made, avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. And. D. White the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

No. 205.] LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, April 29, 1881. (Received May 18.)

SIR: As you have doubtless heard much of the "Anti-Jewish movement" in Germany and may be interested in the facts regarding it, I have drawn up an account of its general history, which I have now the honor to forward.

The form of active opposition to the Jews in Germany, known as the anti-Semitic agitation, had its origin in the "Christian Socialists," a party formed in 1878 to oppose Social Democracy, its founder being one of the Berlin court preachers, the Rev. Dr. Stöcker. Social Democracy was then at its height. The Emperor's life was in continual danger, and two daring attempts to assassinate him had been made in the public streets. Socialistic opinions were gaining victories at the polls, and the conservative and moderate part of the community was becoming greatly alarmed. This was the state of affairs when Prince Bismarck passed the socialistic law of October, 1878, which declared Berlin in a state of siege, and when Dr. Stöcker set forth the social and religious means of regenerating the working classes of the country. As a main factor in the origin of the discontent which filled those classes, Stöcker pointed to the Jews, who had, he said, alienated the community from Christianity, continually reviled the Christian religion in their press, were, as in the case of Lassalle, the founders of impracticable socialistic schemes, and had been in 1873 and 1874 the originators of hundreds of bubble companies, to the break-up of which was due, in no small degree, the industrial depression and the prevalent want of "commercial morality." Dr. Stöcker therefore called upon the working class to become "Christian Socialists," especially were they to remain loyal to the Emperor; to resist the attack on the Christian religion made by Jewish skeptics, and to seek relief from social evils by legislation rather than by revolution and outrage. To this end he proposed laws regulating factory labor, compulsory insurance against accidents, the formation of trades guilds, and the extension of paternal government generally.

This programme was advocated at public meetings of the Christian Socialist party, which often ended in great uproar. All of it attracted much attention; but its most popular feature was undoubtedly that attacking the Jews. Not much eloquence was needed to inflame the anti-Semitic feeling of many patriotic Germans. Envy at the wealth of the Jews, especially those of Berlin, had probably more influence in arousing hostility than the religious, ethnological, and æsthetic reasons advanced by Dr. Stöcker.

The 600,000 Jews in Prussia are possessed of great wealth. They are exclusive socially; and do not encourage intermarriage. The finest places of worship and of business, and the most prosperous newspapers are theirs. Since 1848 their influence as lawyers, professors, and legislators has become extraordinary, so that at present the chief orators of the Prussian Diet and the Imperial Parliament, several of the foremost members of the Berlin faculty, and many of the most vigorous men of letters and writers for the press are Jews. The restrictions upon their liberty were removed by the exertions of the Liberal and Progressive parties, and to these accordingly they have always attached themselves, hoping, doubtless, to wring from the Conservative and Court parties yet greater concessions—concessions which shall, for example, place them on a footing of social equality with Christians in court and military circles.

Among the first supporters of the Stöcker agitation were, therefore, many of the naturally conservative—the landed proprietors, the junkers or petty nobility, the great nobility and the court. Jews, they said, had identified themselves with the Liberal and Progressive parties, with social Democratic agitations and all that is usually supposed to be inimical in Germany to political and social safety; and Jews had as a necessary consequence fallen into discredit among those who were interested in the existing order of things.

The meetings of the Christian Socialists grew more and more frequent during 1879, and more devoted to expressions of anti-Semitic feeling. Towards the close of that year Dr. Stöcker issued his views regarding the Jews in a pamphlet. His gravest charge against them was their attitude towards the Christian religion, which he declared they were undermining in their newspapers and books. He pointed to the education of German children by Semitic schoolmasters as a great evil, attacked the "overbearing" conduct of the Jews in Berlin, where they number 45,000; remarked upon the fact that 30 per cent. of the scholars in German high schools were Jews; that out of 100 Jews 71.3 were employers, while out of 100 Protestants only 38.7 had reached that position; that 55 per cent. of the Jewish and only 12 per cent. of the Protestant population was engaged in trade; and was especially severe upon Jewish disinclination to physical labor, and upon their "anti-Germanic" character.*

Up to this point Dr. Stöcker had carried on his agitation in comparative obscurity; but now he and his party suddenly became notorious. His pamphlet ran through five or six editions, and soon there engaged in the controversy a man of far more ability and influence—Dr. Treitschke, professor of history at the Berlin University—a member of the Imperial Parliament, and one of the most admired of German historians. In a political journal, edited by him, he wrote several articles dealing with the question and republished them in pamphlet form†.

In these he took ground against the Jews on the ground that they are "non-German;" that they have produced no national German literature, no great works of art; that they conduct a press which discredits all purely German tendencies; that they are not assimilated with the German nation, remaining a nationality within a state whose people they regard as antagonists, and that they continue to swarm over the German borders from Poland as "trouser-selling youths" in order to become rich by preying on the easy-going Germans. On this coming in of the Jews from the eastern provinces he laid especial stress. He declared Prussian Poland a kind of vast hive, sending constantly new swarms of barbarians to pervert the ideas and eat out the substance of the German people. He asserted that in this lies the fundamental difference between the state of the question in Germany and in other countries; that in England, France, and Spain, the Jews are comparatively few, subjected from childhood to the influence of Christian civilization and that they are rapidly assimilated by society; whereas in Germany they come in hordes, greedy for prey, too many and too far gone in their ideas to be assimilated.

These articles aroused a storm. The spring and summer of 1880 produced a great crop of Jew literature; the booksellers' shop-windows were darkened by it; Professor Treitschke's position was vehemently attacked by writers of the Liberal and Progressive press, and as vehemently defended by the Conservative press. Several Jewish university professors replied to his argument, but when a Christian minister put in a word for peace the Crown Prince strongly and publicly recommended the pamphlet of the latter.

Among the replies the most effectual was one by Dr. Harry Breslau, a personal friend of Treitschke, and, like him, a professor of history in the University of Berlin‡.

Breslau pointed out the numerous sins of Germans against Jews at present, and especially in times past, showing particularly, too, how the Roman Catholic press of Germany had, in 1875, begun a crusade against them; that the restrictions imposed upon them until 1812 and 1848 had rendered their assimilation with Germans impossible; that many had become entirely German in sentiment, and that thousands had made sacrifices for the fatherland; that the German press was not so entirely under the influence of the Jewish editors and correspondents as was supposed; and he called attention to the enormous debt modern civilization owes to the ancient literature of the Jews, and all this in an admirable spirit and temper.

Despite the efforts of the Crown Prince and the sober reasoning of Professor Breslau, the agitation grew in intensity. Dr Stöcker contined to hold his meetings and new pamphleteers appeared every day in various parts of the empire with new developments of the arguments of Stöcker, Treitschke, and their opponents. The Jew was no longer to be hated as a usurer; but he was to be combated for reasons of "race," for his "non-Germanism." An anti-Semitic league was formed, which drew up a petition to the chancellor, and which was circulated throughout Germany for signature. It implored Prince Bismarck (1) to limit, at least, if not wholly hinder, the immigration into Germany of foreign Jews; (2) to exclude Jews from all offices of authority, and to restrict their activity in the legal career, particularly on the bench; (3) to prevent their becoming teachers in the Christian schools, and to admit them only in very exceptional cases into others; and (4) to cause statistics to be collected as to the Hebrew population of the empire.

Throughout the summer of 1880, this petition formed the text for thousands of anti-Semitic addresses, and in the autumn the agitation reached its highest point. It had spread among the students at the universities of Berlin, Leipsic, and Göttingen, who formed anti-Jew soci eties; even schoolmasters and professors in gymnasiums were affected by it. In Berlin two of the last-named class provoked a Jewish trader into an assault upon them in a public conveyance, and in Leipsic a Jew was led to assault a "baiter," as the anti-Semitic agitators are called.

Public indignation was at length aroused. In Berlin it resulted in the offending gymnasium professor being expelled from his position, and in a public declaration against the anti-Jew agitators by Professors Deoysen, Virchow, Hoffmann, (now rector of the university), Mommsen, and others distinguished for scholarly and political activity. But large meetings, at which from 4,000 to 6,000 persons were present, continued to be held, and the disorderly proceedings at some of these gave rise to much comment in the foreign press. The strictly Germanic idea was studiously maintained. Public announcements calling the meetings asked none but men of German origin to be present, and if Jews were detected in the audience they were somewhat unceremoniously expelled to the accompaniment of groans and hisses. Yet it does not appear that any Jew received bodily injury at these meetings, and the reports published in foreign journals to the effect that Jews were the objects of general assault and insult throughout Germany were undoubtedly exaggerated.

The most serious phase of the agitation was that finding expression in the universities. In Berlin the anti-Semitic students refused to hear the lectures of certain Jewish professors, entitled though these are by ability, age, and past services to the greatest respect. All friends of the Jews among the professors, even the rector and Professor Mommsen, were made to feel the antagonism of the anti-Semitic league by the shouts which drowned their lectures.

On the 20th of November the petition was discussed in the Prussian Diet in connection with a question put by a member of the Progressionist party as to the attitude of the government towards such a petition. Count Stolberg-Wernigerode, vice-president of the ministry, replied that a petition of the kind referred to had not been presented to the government, and could not therefore be officially taken into consideration; but that at the same time the government would not hesitate to say that the existing laws insured the equality of all religious creeds in political respects, and that the ministry had no intention of altering the state of the law. The standing orders of the Diet allow a debate to follow a question, but they exclude the possibility of the House passing a resolution upon the subject of an interrogation.

The result of the animated two days' debate which followed this answer of the minister could not, therefore, be revealed by a division and vote; but it was clear to those present that a majority of the members did not have much fault to find with the agitation. The chief speakers in the first day's debate were Professor Hänel, the leader of the Progressionists, who had asked the question, and who strongly opposed the whole agitation; a leading member of the Central or Roman Catholic party, who complained that "the Jews contribute the main contingent to the non-productive, speculative part of society," and who "did not think they had justified the hopes attending their emancipation;" a Conservative, who stated on behalf of his party "that a feeling of deep displeasure prevailed against the Jews among nearly all classes of the people, because the Jews, especially in their press, did not show that respect for the institutions of the state which the Christians had a right to demand;" Professor Virchow, the well-known scientist, who complained that the answer of the government, though quite correct, was very cool, and cited statistics to show that there was no cause for alarm as to the immigration or overgrowth of the Jews, and traced the present popular antipathy to them to the baser passions, especially envy at their possessions.

In the course of the second day's debate, which was longer and more tumultuous than the first, Mr. Richter, a leader of a section of the Liberals, said there were more Christian than Jewish usurers; that a Jew, Dr. Lasker, had been the first to expose the swindling joint stock companies, and that the founder of the largest popular savings bank was a Jew. He stated further that the movement was much more dangerous than that of the Social Democracy, and asked that its leaders be deprived of their offices and dignities.

The next speaker was the Rev. Dr. Stöcker, who had done so much to stimulate public feeling on the question. He described the movement as social and economical, resulting from the fact that "half a million Jews take a position in Germany out of harmony with their numbers." He then denounced the Jewish press, which is nearly synonymous with the Liberal press, for its attack on the Christian religion, and pointed to the Israelite Alliance as a powerful political combination, which must be wrestled with.

Several other speakers took part in the debate, which ended in great uproar, the question being really left where the House had found it. The public journals eagerly discussed the debate, those of Progressive views claiming that it had forever silenced the Stöcker party, and those of Conservative and semi-official character declaring that the question should never have been asked, and that the debate had injured the Jewish position.

But it was soon shown that the current of popular feeling had not diminished. Crowded and stormy meetings continued to be held, at which the attacks on the Jews were revived; and a new series of pamphlets on the question was issued. The most noticeable of these was one by Professor Mommsen, whose object was to prove that, in the formation of the modern German Empire, the Jews had co-operated in proportion not less materially than the other races. He also made an attack on Professor Treitschke for his part in the agitation, which ended in personal recriminations between the two historians.

The example thus set by the professors was followed by the university students, great numbers of whom refused to hear their Jewish instructors, and attended anti-Semitic meetings, which in some instances had to be dispersed by the police.

At this latter series of discussions the political character of the movement became more apparent, resolutions being passed to the effect that "the citizens of Berlin are convinced that the Liberal party should not identify itself with Judaism if not wishing to drive the electors into the Conservative camp."

Notwithstanding the answer of the vice minister president in the Prussian Diet and the tone of the semi-official press, the attitude of the government, or at the least, the personal inclinations of its leading members and of the court, became more and more a matter of public interest, and it was doubtless with a desire to satisfy this curiosity that a writer in the Grenz Boten, which has often been privileged to reveal the policy of the chancellor, energetically protested against the belief that Prince Bismarck favors the anti-Semitic movement, and commented very severely upon Court Chaplin Stöcker's connection with it. The chancellor's semi-official organ also, the "Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung," especially denied that the government secretly favored the agitation, but the meetings were allowed to continue, and the place of Dr. Stöcker, who had gone on a lecturing tour in the provinces, was supplied by Dr. Henrici, a quondam schoolmaster and a successful mob orator. His efforts kept up the agitation throughout January, breeding much hatred; and aided in the establishment of an additional anti-Semitic newspaper, for which, it was reported, the sum of 50,000 marks had been subscribed. The petition was briskly advertised, and on April 13, when the number of signatures had reached 255,000, was presented to the chancellor. Of these one-fifth came from Silesia; the province of Brandenburg supplied about 38,000, including 12,000 from Berlin; Westphalia, 27,000; the Rhine province, 20,000; Bavaria, 9,000; and Baden and Hohenzollern, 7,000.

Of the views of the Emperor very little, if any, indication has been given. He has acknowledged certain loyal resolutions, transmitted to him by an anti-Semitic meeting, but has spoken with much severity of some riotous proceedings of over-zealous Jew-haters. As to the crown prince, when the agitation had been rekindled by the parliamentary debate, he publicly attended the worship at the Jewish synagogue, doubtless to express his sympathy with the attacked; and in January, he again took occasion openly to express his entire disapproval of the agitation.

At present the movement shows signs of becoming more and more political in character, losing its distinctive social features by an alliance with the Conservative parties. As offshoots from the Christian Socialists, there have come into existence the Anti-Semitic League and the Volks Verein (People's Union). The first has the avowed object of simply attacking the Jews, and the latter aims at expressing national conservative opinions in opposition to Jewish, Liberal, and Progressionist views. These societies continue to hold meetings, which are now, however, extremely orderly, in consequence of a new city police regulation forbidding all direct attacks, or incentives to attacks upon any section of the community. That the anti-Semitic feeling is still the mainstay of these societies is beyond question; it manifests itself as bitterly as ever in their public journals, and becomes embodied in new conservative associations.

That this is shrewd policy is hardly to be doubted, and its result will doubtless be seen at the next elections. There are, especially in Berlin, strong prejudices against Jews even among "Liberals" and "Progressionists." Around those who claim to have personal grievances against the Jews, the tradesmen who have been driven from better business quarters into worse by "rings" of Hebrew dealers; the people whose rents have been raised when the houses they occupied came into the possession of Jews; the smaller speculators whose occupation has been taken from them by Jewish millionaires; the borrowers sold out by Jewish usurers; and the bankrupts who attribute their failure to unscrupulous Jewish trading and to combined and systematic competition on the part of Jews until the Christian trader is driven out of the field; around these men there are gathered those who oppose Judaism from less material motives; those who regard with alarm the ascendency of Jewish power in politics, literature, and art, where, it is declared, purely Germanic ideas are scarcely permitted to come to light, and where the idealizm of the German character, which has again and again been the well-spring of German vigor, is being gradually weakened by the materialistic and skeptical tendencies of Jewish thought.

But larger and more hopeful ideas are also at work. Thinking men can hardly fail eventually to see that the services of Jews to Germany have been very great; that harsh dealings are attributable to Christians as well as Jews; that the characteristics complained of are mainly due to ages of wrong; that time will steadily work an amalgamation of races; and that the result of such a union will be to increase German vigor. The present anti-Semitic movement is to be regretted as a temporary hinderance to the process, but that it will result in any new constitutional or legislative barriers, I see no reason to believe.
